Now, that was simply making a practical application of what the pulpit tells us every Sunday,—that is all. There is nothing Utopian in it: there is nothing difficult in it. It is simply decency. [Laughter and applause.] There is no going back to the days of the early Christians in it: it is simply recognizing the debt which that concern feels that it owes to those men who have worked in season and out to bring success to this establishment. They do not do it in charity: they say it is due. I know very well, Mr. President and gentlemen, that you cannot with safety undertake to substitute ethics for economics. But, when you have established an economic relation, you have merely brought into force an ethical one. And it is not so much a question what wages you pay, or what action you take in business, as what spirit you have behind it. [Applause.]

Now, I undertake to say that the Unitarian pulpit has done an immense service in the world in these respects. It has had in its various congregations the great managers of business. It has not had yet enough of the other side, and it must reach them. Instead of organizing here and there a feeble church, it must organize a strong church for the people, in a great industrial centre, as an experiment. Then, with the ministers that you can send there, reaching these people and bringing into their hearts that God-like spirit that Carlyle speaks of, you can work a service in spiritualizing the American people. For in service there is a spiritualizing sense of something different from theological spiritualizing, something different from that which we speak of in our pulpit,—a sense of a social service rendered. There is a social exchange, then, something to society as well as to himself.

Doing this, you would bring to men who are not now reached a spiritualizing influence,—the spiritualizing influence which comes through industrial forces. Whenever you bring this to man, you have helped him. Whenever there is God-like stirring in the hearts and souls of men, whether it comes with the experience of the boy who pledges his boy love to the little girl of his choice, and resolves then and there, at ten or fifteen years of age,—you have all been through that experience, gentlemen [laughter],—that he will live a life that shall be an honor and a credit to her, or whether it comes with those greater and more vital experiences of manhood,—however it comes, in service to the church, service to your neighbor, or in any other way, that God-like stirring helps to spiritualize the community in which the man who feels it lives. And there is no better way of preaching than to illustrate these great truths by the practical work of every day. A German socialist, Rudolph Todt,—not a destructive socialist, but a constructive one,—said that political economy was to the body politic what anatomy is to the human body: it teaches its construction and the working of its parts. Socialism is to the body politic what pathology is to the human body: it teaches the action and the development of disease. But religion is to the body politic what therapeutics is to the human body,—the cure. And there is no other cure for all the evils which come to us in this life than a practical application of the Christian religion in every-day life. [Applause.] He says, in order to study social conditions, he wants always on his right hand the works of political economy, on the left hand the works of social science, and in front of him the New Testament. Then he is equipped to study social problems.

Can the Unitarian Church help along such things? Can the Unitarian Church render a service to the American people in helping to spiritualize it? I believe it has a mission before it. I believe that that mission is to bring out the very declaration of the Conference at Saratoga, reiterated at the Conference at Washington, that the basis of the whole business of Christian unity in the world is love to God and love to man. It is the source of our success, it is the source of our inspiration. With it, practically applied, there can be no failure to the Unitarian order. [Applause.]

Mr. Wolcott then introduced, as the last speaker of the evening, Rev. E. A. Horton of Boston.

ABSTRACT OF ADDRESS BY REV. E. A. HORTON.

The Conference at Washington—in whose stream I wish you had all been baptized—marks the highest mark reached yet by the zeal and intelligence of the Unitarian denomination. But, when my friend Batchelor tells us that the Fiske and Everett night was the star night, I must be permitted to put in a little plea for Tuesday night. That was the young people's night; and I mention it because Unitarians are waking up to the consciousness that, if they wish to see their churches perpetuated, and the grand cause they have at heart prolonged, they must take heed to the young people. [Applause.] And that night they rallied and listened to a man who, from his high presidential office, has never yet scorned to reach down and join hands with the humble Sunday-school worker. Dr. G. Stanley Hall has seen that the religious and moral education of the young is as necessary as the intellectual polishing going on in college and academy. Have we a message and service for the people? Yes, it seems to me, just as much as when I, a green and gawky Freshman, was wandering about the precincts of the University of Michigan, and feeling in my ignorance that the religious drop, small though it may seem to be, put into the cup of life is that which makes it what it ought to be. Groping, fumbling thus, I had a message from the Unitarians in the works of Theodore Parker. I heard his voice, and followed it: I found in Unitarianism a spiritual service which has given me whatsoever of joy, of usefulness, I have had in this world. It is the same to-day. Keep touch with the boys and with the young men.

And what must our service be? We must see to it that we stand now, as before, for sincerity. If sincerity were more predominant in the theological world, in sermons, in the actual consistency or inconsistency of organized religion, we should see a manifestation of light breaking in, such as we should remember. The wastes and burdens of inconsistency and contradiction are taking the heart and life out of the powers of organized religion. To-day we have Whittier in the choir in almost every church, and Dean Stanley said you could always hear Emerson in the pulpit; and yet the creeds and the covenants flatly contradict them. Here is where a part of the great trouble is; and the Unitarian comes modestly but firmly to say: "I will bring a spiritual service to this country by standing, first and last, for transparent genuineness and sincerity. I will affirm what I do believe, and no more; and I will trust God if I make a blunder."

And the Unitarian Church is also to be of service to-day by showing that we get more of faith to-day and larger view in withdrawing from tradition, in going out into the great highways of science and gathering testimonies there. Thus we shall gain a deeper and a more magnificent faith than that we are thought to destroy and take away.

But, friends, if I can read the signs of the times, you will be called upon, not to defend this particular doctrine or that organized form of the recognition of God. You will be called upon to stand for a church polity that means the Congregational system as against one taking its authority from bishops or synods. I am not talking any A. P. A. doctrine; but there are Protestant churches that are now pressing with urgency their claims upon New England and the country at large. And those who thoughtlessly train in their company are tying their hands and denying their heredit, and coming into the possibility of mental and spiritual bondage. New England Congregationalism is a church government of the people, for the people, and by the people; and, if we surrender that, we are in danger of losing ground that we have fought for and gained,—the right to think for yourself, the immediate communication with the Almighty simply as a child of God, the ability to organize a church and keep it independent.

The joy that lies in the religion of Jesus has never yet burst in all its glory upon the world. The Unitarian Church can give to the American people that good news which brings sunshine for men all along his struggling pathway. And one word more: the Unitarian Church, when it talks about unity, talks about the only sense that you hear promulgated in this country. Do you suppose the dear Christian people are going to flock into that quadrilateral that was promulgated by that council? Do you suppose that ecclesiastical unity is the goal of man? Do you believe that we are going to write the same vertical style of religious tradition? No: we have found the sesame which shall open the doors of the future. It is "love to God and love to man." And diversity in unity is the only possible system that intelligent freemen can expect in a Christian republic. We have laid the basis for it; and it is a spiritualizing thing to lead people to understand that to bow this way, or to write that way, or to pronounce a shibboleth, can never bring that Christian unity for which all pray and labor.

Friends, it is refreshing to a minister, even though he meets you constantly, to see you gather here and look one way, with your faces lighted with the glorious inspiration of this faith, which, whether it is called Unitarianism or something else, will enter in and conquer, because it is germane to the spirit of our principles, and was in the ink in which the pens were dipped which wrote the charters of our freedom and our privileges. [Applause.]

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

DIRECTORS' MEETING.

The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, November 12. There were present Mrs. Hooper, Mrs. Wells, and Mrs. Williams, and Messrs. Ames, Batchelor, Brown, Butler, Dole, Fox, Hosmer, Howe, Long, Lyman, Savage, and Stone.

The treasurer made the following statement for October, 1895:—

INCOME.
Cash on hand, October 1.....	$417.64
Special gift (to be invested).....	25,000 00
From donations.....	5,586 50
From Indian School.....	2,511.57
From bequests (to be invested).....	5,000.00
From sale of books, Income Fund, etc.....	1,273.69
$39,789.40
EXPENDITURES.
For missionary work, etc.....	$6,131.55
For book department, expenses, etc.....	1,337.94
For Indian School.....	2,792 11
For investment.....	1,000.00
Cash on hand.....	28,527.80
$39,789.40

On recommendation of the Finance Committee a bequest from Ira P. Farrington of Portland, Me., to the Church Building Loan Fund of $20,000 was accepted, and the treasurer authorized to receipt for the same.

A plan presented by the treasurer, and approved by the committee, for raising money was read and approved by the board, and the treasurer authorized to take the necessary steps for carrying the plan into execution.

On recommendation of the Publication Committee new editions were authorized of "Hymns for Church and Home, with Tunes," Channing's "Works," and Martineau's "Endeavors after the Christian Life."

It was voted to print as tracts "The Theology of Unitarians," by Charles Carroll Everett, D.D., LL.D., "Incarnation," by Rev. William C. Gannett, "The Church and the Masses," by Rev. John Cuckson, and "Our Gospel," by Rev. Minot J. Savage; to buy one thousand copies of "The Forward Movement of Unitarianism," by Rev. George Batchelor, and one thousand copies of "A Personal Statement by a Layman," by George W. Stone; to buy copies of the Christian Register containing reports of the National Conference; to grant Unitarian books to the Willcox Library, Girard, Pa., and to the Washington City Free Library.

On recommendation of the Pacific Coast Committee the following appropriations were made for the year beginning Dec. 1, 1895: to the First Unitarian Society, Alameda, Cal., $250; to the Unitarian Society, Pomona, Cal., $250; to the First Unitarian Society, Ontario, Cal., $200; to the Unitarian Society, Stockton, Cal., $400; to the Santa Maria Unitarian Society, Santa Maria, Cal., $300; to the First Unitarian Church, San José, Cal., $750; to the Unitarian Society, San Diego, Cal., $600; for missionary work in Eugene, Ore., $100; for missionary work in Medford, Ore., $50; to the First Unitarian Society, Puyallup, Wash., $300; to the First Unitarian Church, McMillin, Wash., $100; to the First Unitarian Society, Spokane, Wash., $350; also to the First Unitarian Society, Redlands, Cal., for the year beginning Jan. 1, 1896, $250; and to the First Unitarian Society, Seattle, Wash., for the year beginning Jan. 1, 1896, $600. It was also "Voted, That $1,000 be appropriated, with travelling expenses (for six months), to pay for the services of Rev. C. W. Wendte as superintendent for the Pacific Coast, for the year beginning Dec. 1, 1895, all sums received for preaching to be credited to the Association.

"Voted, That $250 be appropriated for one-fourth of the expenses of Unitarian headquarters at San Francisco, for the year beginning Dec. 1, 1895."

On recommendation of the Southern Committee, it was "Voted, That the appropriation asked for by the First Unitarian Church, Chattanooga, Tenn., be for the present laid upon the table, to await further information concerning the prospects of raising money in Chattanooga."

On recommendation of the Western Committee the following appropriations were made: to Unity Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, for six months, beginning Oct. 1, 1895, $150; to the Unity Church, St. Cloud, Minn., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1895, $200; to Rev. A. H. Norman, for missionary work among the Scandinavians in Brown County, Minnesota, under the direction of the superintendent for the Central West, for six months, beginning Oct. 1, 1895, $200; to assist the society at St. Anthony Park, Minn., in gaining a clear title to the land upon which their building stands, $280; to Unity Church, St. Joseph, Mo., $340.

The consideration of our Japan Mission having been especially assigned for the November meeting, the Committee, on Foreign Missions recommended, and it was "Voted, To appropriate the sum called for in the estimates of Rev. Clay MacCaulley for the support of the Japan Mission, for the year beginning Nov. 1, 1895, $4,350."

This includes the income of the Hayward Fund and $50 contributed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

A long and earnest discussion preceded this vote. The reasons which influenced the minds of the directors may be summarized as follows:—

First, the mission is established, has a commodious building, is doing a work of great value, attracts the attention of all religious parties in the empire, whether native or foreign, is regarded by many orthodox missionaries as a most dangerous obstacle to the methods of old-fashioned orthodox views of salvation, is opposed by conservative Buddhists, is the most efficient and successful foe of ancient superstitions, and by thousands of Japanese, as twenty-five hundred letters of inquiry in a year testify, is regarded as the friend of all those who would live in the spirit.

Second, the abandonment of our mission, already foretold by its enemies in Japan, would be telegraphed throughout the civilized world as one more evidence of the spiritual incapacity of Unitarianism to meet the needs of humanity.

Third, the directors were convinced that, if the real state of the case were understood by their constituents in America, they would be held responsible for committing a great blunder, and ceasing their efforts just at the time when the fruit was beginning to ripen. The tendency of the majority of the native Christians, according to the testimony of eminent orthodox authorities, is in the direction of Unitarianism. These reasons seemed so urgent that, when the vote was taken, there was but one negative vote.

The secretary announced as gifts to the Association the receipt of a portrait in oils of Rev. S. H. Winkley of Boston, also one of Hon. Enoch Pratt of Baltimore, Md., and that these additions to the gallery of portraits are on exhibition in Room No. 4 of the Unitarian Building. The secretary was instructed to thank the donors.

An application for $300 for the "Beneficiary Fund" of the Meadville Theological School was referred to the Committee on Education; also a communication from President Long of Antioch College was referred to the Association by the National Conference. Mrs. Thomas Talbot of North Billerica, Mass., was elected to the vacant place upon the board of directors of the Association. Adjourned.

GEORGE BATCHELOR, Sec'y.

Treasurer's Notes.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

A book with the title "Stories and Poems for Children," by Celia Thaxter, has just been issued. The name describes the book. It is neatly printed. The author's work is too well known to call for any comment. 257 pages. $1.13.

The new hymn-book entitled "Hymns for Church and Home" is meeting with general approval. As the holidays are approaching, this might be used for a Christmas gift. It would be a valuable addition to the music of the home, and would be useful many times when the family and friends gather around the piano or organ for a Sunday evening sing. The old tunes are there, and many beautiful new ones also. Price $1.50.

The "Manual" for 1895 of the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Christian Women has been issued; and it is evident, from the amount of work that was carried on by the officers for several days in this building,—folding, directing, and mailing them,—it has been very widely distributed. This organization is growing in importance and usefulness every year, and its management has been very able and successful. The Publication Committee has authorized the publication of four of the papers given at the last meeting of the National Conference in tract form; and, as soon as they can be printed, which we hope will be within a few weeks, we shall be ready to distribute for Post-office Mission and other work. The tracts will be as follows: the Conference sermon, "Our Gospel," by Rev. M. J. Savage; "The Church and the Masses," by Rev. John Cuckson; "Our Unitarian Theology," by Dr. C. C. Everett; "Incarnation," by Rev. William C. Gannett. These tracts will give the latest Unitarian word on the subjects treated, and will no doubt have a wide circulation, as they ought to have. We also have a tract nearly ready, entitled "The Forward Movement of Unitarianism," by the secretary, Rev. George Batchelor, preached by him in Unity pulpit, November 8,—a tract that ought to be used extensively, a strong and encouraging statement to Unitarians generally.

We have this week received a fine oil portrait of Hon. Enoch Pratt of Baltimore, which is now on exhibition in the building. Mr. Pratt is one of our oldest and strongest Unitarians. It was a rare sight to see the cordial greeting between him and the venerable Dr. Furness at the late Conference in Washington. Mr. Pratt does not often, we imagine, have an opportunity to greet any one his senior; but eighty-seven is less than ninety-three, and the minister is the senior.

FINANCES.

The Association is not receiving the contributions it needs, by any means. It has received several bequests; but they are all, with one exception, for investment, and they do not help our present needs very much. It is a great disappointment to those charged with the executive work that they are unable to carry out the excellent plans that have been prepared; but we must wait on the churches. If we could have a fixed income for a few years, independent of the contributions from the churches, we could lay out some work that it is not possible to consider now.

We are constantly hearing of bequests and gifts from Unitarians to the many excellent charities that are being carried on; and we sometimes wonder if our good friends are not laboring under a misapprehension as to the missionary work of our Church, and if many of them do not think that somebody else is looking after us, so that we do not get the attention we deserve, and that we would surely get if our generous friends really knew how much we needed their help. Remember, friends, that the way to help the Unitarian cause is to help the American Unitarian Association.

VISITS.

Sunday, November 10, at the old Second Church in Boston, one of the most interesting of our older churches, and one that will always be identified in many minds as the church which had Ralph Waldo Emerson as its minister. Monday evening, at Jamaica Plain First Congregational Society, a very pleasant meeting of the Congregational Union of that church. The vestry of this church is one of the most convenient, and in all respects one of the finest, I have yet seen. The meeting was a pleasant and, we hope, a profitable one to all. Wednesday, November 13, at the old church in Roxbury, to attend a meeting of the New England Associate Alliance. This is the New England Branch of the Women's Alliance, and therefore a very important part of the body of Unitarian workers to which many of us are looking to supply a quality of work sadly needed in our denomination.

Wednesday evening, Unitarian Club of Boston, at Hotel Vendome,—an enthusiastic and inspiring meeting, in which the last and best words of our faith were spoken with eloquence and power. Thursday evening a reception to our secretary, Mr. Batchelor, given him by the Unitarians of the First Parish of Cambridge in their spacious vestry,—a cordial welcome to Mr. Batchelor, who has taken up his residence in this old parish. Such occasions as these, that draw together socially the Unitarians of the parish, and indeed of many parishes, can but do good.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

The Sunday School.

The usual Channing Hall "Talk" will be held next Saturday, November 23, at 25 Beacon Street, at 2.30 o'clock, conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. The subject will be Lesson XI., "The Good Samaritan." All cordially invited.

As aids to the observance of Christmas, the Unitarian Sunday School Society offers reprints of their successful services, published in 1888, 1892, and 1894. Price 5 cents per copy, $4 per hundred. These pamphlet services contain responsive readings, prayers, and a fine collection of appropriate music. No new service will be issued this year.

The current leaflet lessons on "The Teaching of Jesus" are now ready for December. The subjects are "The Shepherd and his Flock," "The Laborers in the Vineyard," "The Ten Virgins," and "The Lighted Candle." The Advanced lessons are prepared by Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, the Intermediate by Rev. Edward A. Horton, and the Primary by Mrs. J. C. Jaynes. The Intermediate and Advanced are printed together on one leaflet. Primary illustrated, also a four-page leaflet. Price 50 cents by the dozen or hundred, postage not included.

Primary Education, a monthly journal for primary teachers, is one of the best publications of its class in the country. We have occasion constantly to turn to this magazine, and we find ample resources of suggestion and help. Mrs. Eva D. Kellogg is the editor, and her outlook over the department she has in hand is very broad and clear. The variety of articles, the pertinency of the illustrations, and the progressive spirit of the whole journal are evidenced in every number. In the articles by leading teachers in our common schools, which constantly appear, there is a great deal calculated to aid Sunday-school workers. This valuable help for work among the primaries is issued by the Educational Publishing Company, 50 Bromfield Street, Boston. Subscription price $1 a year.

Religious Intelligence.

THE Ministerial Union will meet in Channing Hall, Boston, on Monday, November 25, at 10.30 A.M. Dr. Charles Carroll Everett will give the address. His subject will be "The Relation of the Present Age to the Doctrine of Immortality." The meeting will be open to the public.

THE Essex (Mass.) Unitarian Club held its fall meeting last Friday evening in Salem. Seventy-eight gentlemen were present, and enjoyed the fine addresses Mr. Savage and Mr. Horton gave upon "The Meaning of Unitarianism." This meeting ended the second year of the club, which has so far had a very successful existence, both in regard to membership and interesting discussions. The club hold three meetings annually, one of which is "Ladies' Night."

BOSTON.—Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Rev. Thomas Van Ness will speak upon "The Preacher" on Sunday evening, at eight o'clock, in the series upon "Makers of Modern Society." Rev. S. H. Winkley will preach at 3.15.

The policy of Morgan Chapel has greatly changed during the past few months. Classes have been organized in printing, carpentering, shoe-repairing, and tailoring, in which twenty-three men and women have already enrolled. They meet on Monday and Thursday evenings, from 7.30 till 9 P.M.; and we invite any of our friends to come in and see their work. Public baths will be opened this week. It is the present policy to help men and women help themselves, and any help sent us will go toward defraying the expenses of this work. Any one wishing to help a worthy person to a Thanksgiving dinner will find no better way than by sending his gifts either to Miss E. S. Emmons or the pastor of Morgan Chapel, 87 Shawmut Avenue. Good use can be made of cast off clothing.

G. S. WARNER, Associate Pastor.

Parker Memorial (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): The Sunday evening services for the third winter were commenced November 17. Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., gave the opening sermon on "A Review of the Progress in Religion during this Century." Dr. Hale's remarks were highly interesting. He referred to Dr. S. F. Smith and Dr. T. T. Stone, both of whom had so recently passed away, in advanced years. He drew a comparison between the conditions existing when these men were born, at the beginning of the century, and those that are now surrounding us at the close of the century, as a background for a very graphic portrayal of the great theological changes which have come to pass in New England theology. Dr. Hale also mentioned true freedom, spiritual courage, and a real Christian brotherhood as three prominent traits in the development. Next Sunday evening, November 24, Rev. Minot J. Savage will speak on the subject of "Heresy." Services begin at 7.30 o'clock. Fine music at each service. Seats free, and a welcome to all.

ATHOL, MASS.—Second Church: The Athol Transcript publishes every Tuesday morning a column of Second Unitarian Church news. The following four items appear every week: "This church welcomes to membership, irrespective of creed, color, or nationality, all who, 'in the love of the truth and the spirit of Jesus Christ, wish to unite for the worship of God and the service of man.' This church is supported by voluntary subscriptions and offerings. The pews are not rented, sold, or taxed, but are all free, so that any one, rich or poor, may occupy any seat at any time. All that consider the Second Unitarian Church their church home are requested to share its burdens as well as its privileges. Members will confer a favor upon their pastor by informing him of any case of sickness or trouble." An impressive service of the Guild of the Good Shepherd was conducted by the pastor, Rev. Carl G. Horst, Sunday evening, November 10. He gave a short address upon the duties, which were really privileges, of the members of the guild, after which thirteen persons were received as members. The weekly meetings have a large attendance.

BROCKTON, MASS.—Rev. Rush R. Shippen was installed pastor of the Unitarian church in Brockton, October 31. An interesting feature was the preaching of the installation sermon by the son of Mr. Shippen, Rev. Eugene R. Shippen of Dorchester. Rev. Dr. Osgood, Rev. C. A. Allen, Rev. A. W. Littlefield, and Rev. Mr. Humphrey took part in the exercises. Brockton ministers from the Orthodox, Episcopal, Methodist, and Universalist churches were present by invitation. Rev. F. A. Warfield, pastor of the Porter Evangelical Church, and Rev. Albert Hammatt, pastor of the Universalist church, welcomed Mr. Shippen to Brockton, and extended to him the hand of fellowship. It was an impressive service. Mr. Shippen has been warmly welcomed by the press, as well as the clergy, who realize his ability and earnestness. Mr. Shippen commenced his labors November 3.

CHELSEA, MASS.—The reception which the Unity Club tendered Rev. Mr. Reccord on October 16 preluded another, which had in it an added element of rejoicing. On November 12 the society of the First Unitarian Church assembled in strong numbers to meet the new minister and his young wife. The hand-to-hand greetings and responses betokened singleness of hope and purpose in pastor and people. During the evening Major Gould presented Mrs. Reccord with a box containing $75 in gold coin, as a gift from the society, for which Mr. Reccord responded in his happiest vein.

EAST BOSTON, MASS.—A correspondent writes: "November 17 was a specially interesting and impressive day. Dr. Fisk entered upon his fourth year of service, and gave an inspiring sermon, full of thought and fervor. The Sunday-school is well officered and equipped for work, with Mr. Reuben Peterson as superintendent, and a corps of faithful teachers, Mr. Roby, leader of the singing. The death of Dr. Smith, author of 'America,' led Dr. Fisk to tell the school something of his life, and to suggest that we close in singing this grand old hymn, which thrilled the hearts of those present."

GRAFTON, MASS.—After a service of four years in Grafton Rev. T. E. Allen read his letter of resignation last Sunday, to take effect February 14.

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

CLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE

GENUINE DUCHESS,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,

SOLE AGENTS.

WINTER ST., BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

KEENE, N.H.—The Unitarian Club of Keene, N.H., held its first meeting for the year on Wednesday evening, November 13. Dr. George B. Twitchell presided. The speaker was the Rev. Charles J. Staples of Manchester, N.H., who gave a very interesting address on the theme "The Christ of Sentiment and the Jesus of History." He was followed by Hon. Edward Gustine and Rev. C. B. Elder, the pastor of the church. This is the fifth year of the existence of the club, and thus far it shows no signs of waning interest. The membership is larger than ever. The club has undoubtedly served to create a stronger feeling of fellowship, and to develop a deeper interest in the liberal cause.

NEW YORK.—The stirring editorial in last week's Christian Register erroneously credits this city with an experience which, no matter how much she needs it, she has not had. It speaks of the "Forward Movement" in New York and Brooklyn; while it is not here, but there, across the river, that this "forwarding" has been going on. The last of the meetings in its interest was held on Sunday evening, the 17th. The series of three have given entire satisfaction to their initiators, and have completely vindicated the somewhat disputed fact that interest in Unitarian thought can be called out almost anywhere if it is gone about in the right way. And the successful way in the Middle States seems to be the Napoleonic one of massing the forces for the first attack. The strongest and best known of our ministers always have a part in the first meetings. The three or four addresses they make revivify even the old-time Unitarians, of which there were a considerable number present at the Brooklyn meetings, while they interest and captivate the newcomers at the start. This method creates a wave of enthusiasm which rarely dies away in a mere mill-pond ripple if a strong and well-directed wind is kept stirring in the neighborhood. In the case of Brooklyn it is the eleventh annual meeting of the Middle States Conference, which occurs on the 19th, 20th, and 21st of November, at the First Unitarian Church of the city, which is expected to roll along, for a time, the "Forward Movement" wave there. The Middle States have now thirty-seven active Unitarian churches. If they are all represented at the conference by their authorized number of delegates, there will be present a substantial nucleus. These, together with the congregations of our New York and Brooklyn churches, and even a small proportion of the strangers who attended the meetings above referred to, will make the coming session, in point of numbers, a brilliant one. The programme, as given in the last New York letter, promises a rich spiritual and intellectual feast.

PETERBORO, N.H.—The first of a series of popular platform meetings, to be held this winter in Southern New Hampshire, was held in this town November 10. About four hundred listened to the group of speakers for this occasion: Rev. Messrs. A. J. Rich of Milford, J. C. Mitchell of Wilton, and Enoch Powell of Nashua. On Sunday evening, November 24, another meeting will be held in Wilton; and the speakers will be Rev. George E. Littlefield of Peterboro and Messrs. Rich and Powell. At similar meetings held in Brooklyn and Gouverneur, N.Y., last week, hundreds were turned away from the packed halls.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.—One of the pleasant features of the Unitarian church service is the music, which is well rendered by a volunteer chorus and orchestra under direction of Miss Georgiana Smith. The concerts given by choir and orchestra for the benefit of the church are deservedly popular.

PORTLAND, ORE.—The William G. Eliot Fraternity of the Church of Our Father has printed its programme for the present season, together with a list of officers and half a dozen committees of work. The subjects of the Sunday evening meetings are given up to May 10, and an interesting course of Shakspeare studies is announced.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.—The ordination and installation of Rev. Adelbert Lathrop Hudson took place in Unity Hall, November 10. The sermon was preached by Rev. T. B. Forbush of Chicago, who also gave the charge to the minister and the right hand of fellowship in behalf of the Unitarian ministry. The ordaining prayer and the charge to the people were by Rev. David Utter. Rev. Clarence T. Brown, pastor of the First Congregational Church of this city, after having held services in his own church, came, and in a catholic spirit welcomed the new minister to Salt Lake City and his new field of labor, saying that his greetings were none the less cordial because his opinions were not identical with those of this church. An interesting feature was the installing address of Hon. N. M. Brigham, the president of the society, who voiced with peculiar force and clearness the forward-looking policy of the Unitarian church.

NEW ENGLAND NEWS.—Rev. J. C. Park of Pittsfield is ill; and the supply of his pulpit is made by brother ministers, who are glad to serve him. Rev. Mr. Huxtable preached there several Sundays ago, and Rev. S. J. Barrows went last Sunday. Rev. R. E. Birks, who is a member of the parish, has been rendering most efficient help. Rev. S. Thomson has been settled in the sturdy little parish of Rowe. He takes with him all the devotion and energy bred in him while minister in the Trinitarian Congregational Church. The newspapers in Dover, N.H., recognize that "two stars of no small magnitude have commenced to shed their brilliant rays" in that city. They name one Rev. Dr. Ward of our Unitarian church. That church, after a season of depression, is growing in strength and influence under its new pastor. The "Unitarian evangel" was earnestly preached in Peterboro, N.H., on the morning and the evening of the 10th inst. by Rev. Mr. Littlefield, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Rich, Mitchell, and Powell. In New London a week ago Rev. W. H. Pulsford preached; and last Sunday evening there was a platform meeting at which addresses were delivered by Rev. C. P. Lombard, Archibald M. Howe, Esq., and Superintendent D. M. Wilson. The same day these three gentlemen began services in the town of West-erly, R.I. In the town of Derby, Conn., two lawyers, E. L. Staples and John H. Light, conducted the services. The church in Ellsworth, Me., after a vigorous campaign of two or three years under the lead of Mr. Cochrane, finds that it is essential to take a rest during the present winter. It is the ardent hope that in the spring services will be resumed. In Waverley special platform services were held last Sunday, which were participated in by Rev. L. B. Macdonald, Rev. L. G. Wilson, and Rev. C. A. Staples. Next Sunday there will be another platform meeting, at which Rev. Albert Walkley, Rev. W. H. Pulsford, and others are expected to take part. D. M. W.

ILLINOIS CONFERENCE.—The twenty-first annual session of the Illinois Conference was held at Shelbyville, November 5 and 6. The annual sermon was by Rev. W. W. Fenn of Chicago, on "Pure Religion and Unfiled." The Shelbyville society, having just completed repairs and decorations on their church, used the occasion for a very delightful and tender service of rededication. Wednesday forenoon was devoted to an "inspirational meeting" led by Rev. Seward Baker of Sterling, business, and an address by Rev. Ada M. Kepley of Effingham on "The Relation of the Church to Temperance." The reports from societies were for the most part of an encouraging nature, but some did not hesitate to exhibit a sense of failure in certain lines. The afternoon session began with short reviews of notable books. Rev. Seward Baker reviewed Caird's "Evolution of Religion"; Rev. W. M. Backus, Balfour's "Foundations of Belief"; Rev. W. W. Fenn, Blass's "Acts of the Apostles." Then followed an address on "Liberty and Religion" by Col. John Sobieski. The business session was largely occupied with the discussion of the resolution passed by the Western Unitarian Conference at its May session, and commended to the consideration of the conference by the American Unitarian Association. The meaning and purport of the resolution becoming clearly understood, the following was unanimously adopted:—

"Resolved, That this conference cordially approves the general spirit and purpose of the plan of affiliation presented by the Western Unitarian Conference, and commended to its consideration by the American Unitarian Association, and hereby nominates Rev. C. F. Elliott as its representative on the Missionary Council and the Board of Directors of the Western Unitarian Conference.

"Inasmuch as the plan has not been unanimously accepted by the State conferences, and therefore at present cannot be carried into effect, this conference recommends that the council, so far as constituted, call a meeting of conference with representatives of the disapproving State conferences, the Western Unitarian Conference, and the American Unitarian Association, in order that the plan may be better understood, or that another of similar purpose and character may be formulated, which shall be acceptable to all concerned, and that the result of this deliberation be presented to this conference at its next session for final action."

The conference closed with a platform meeting, presided over by President Fenn, and taken part in by Rev. Messrs. Bulkeley, Blake, Backus, Douthit, and Elliott. A conference of exquisite spirit and helpfulness.

MISSOURI VALLEY CONFERENCE.—The Missouri Valley Unitarian Conference met in its fall session, November 6 and 7, with the Unitarian church at Wichita, Kan. On the evening of the 6th a most interesting and profitable platform meeting was held. The subject was "Aspects of Unitarianism that have impressed me most." The speakers were: Rev. A. W. Gould, secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference, who spoke on "The Freedom of Unitarianism"; Rev. W. G. Todd of Kansas City, Kan., who spoke on "Its Unrecognized Spiritual-ity"; and Rev. T. B. Forbush, superintendent of the American Unitarian Association in the Central West, who was "impressed" by Unitarianism as a whole, its men and women, its spirit, its doctrine, and the rest. Thursday morning Rev. C. G. Howland of Lawrence, Kan., gave a paper on "Socialism," which was discussed by those present. In the afternoon there was a sermon by Rev. F. M. Bennett of Carthage, Mo., on "Authority in Religion." Rev. A. W. Gould gave a report of the National Unitarian Conference held at Washington. In the evening the conference sermon was preached by Rev. W. G. Todd, whose subject was "The November of Religion." At the business session of the conference Thursday morning a resolution was passed expressing the desire of the conference to have a Unitarian periodical published at Chicago, either a new one or one of the present publications transferred. Another resolution was passed, asking that, if possible, the American Unitarian Association send some of the prominent Eastern preachers to hold services in the various churches of the conference, thus doing what the conference thinks would be a valuable missionary work. The following action was unanimously taken on the proposition submitted to the conference by the Western Unitarian Conference. In regard to the resolutions submitted to this conference by the Western Unitarian Conference, looking toward the union of the Unitarian forces in the Central West,

"Resolved, That the Missouri Valley Unitarian Conference deems the proposed plan of union undesirable and impracticable.

"Resolved, second, That this conference does favor some form of union of forces of the American Unitarian Association and the Western Unitarian Conference in the Central West." A. WYMAN, Sec'y.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—The regular monthly meeting took place at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, on November 8, twelve members present, besides Mrs. Andrews, the former president. The secretary being absent, Mrs. Cleveland was chosen secretary pro tem. The corresponding secretary reported that she had spoken to four Branches during the week,—Taunton, Fairhaven, Waltham, and Dorchester,—and intended to visit Lawrence and Portsmouth before returning to New York. Mrs. Dix reported for the meetings at Washington during the Conference. She also gave an account of the acceptable work of Miss Everett at the Unitarian exhibit at the Atlanta Exposition. On motion of Mrs. Hooper, it was voted that whatever additional sum of money be required to continue Miss Everett's excellent services at the Exposition should be appropriated from the treasury. A letter was read from the Somerville Branch, asking assistance for a fair which will occur December 1. This is referred to the various Branches of the Alliance. The Committee on Appeals read an appeal from the school at Calhoun, where Mr. Dillingham has charge. It was voted unanimously to act in harmony with the following: "The Committee on Appeals urgently recommends to the various Branches the claims of Calhoun, at once a school, a settlement, and an institutional church, of which Rev. Pitt Dillingham is in charge. Though not strictly denominational work, the spirit of it is so much in accord with the spirit of our work that we hope each Branch will feel inclined to aid it to the extent of its ability." Mrs. Hooper recommended the Branches to found scholarships. Mrs. Andrews presented the claims of Green Harbor, which is again without a pastor. Mrs. Dix gave an account of the November meeting of the New York League, and mentioned the great interest in Alliance matters in the Brooklyn churches. Mrs. Ellis Peterson, the newly elected director for Massachusetts, was warmly welcomed. The new "Manual" was presented to the Board, copies of which may be obtained at 25 Beacon Street, or from the secretaries. The Board adjourned till December 13, at which time reports are due from New England, Rocky Mountains, and Pacific Coast.

Business Notices.

Singers and Artists Generally are users of "Brown's Bronchial Troches" for Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, and Throat Irritations. They afford instant relief. Avoid imitations.

The dinner table has become a more important feature of the home since the reduced cost of china and glass has turned the taste of housekeepers that way. The change of fashion from white ware to decorated has taxed the dealers to keep pace with the demand. Jones, McDuffee & Stratton's establishment is a notable one in this line.

A Striking Feature of the forthcoming volume of The Youth's Companion will be a group of articles by famous authors and authoresses. Mrs. Burton Harrison describes her girlhood in Virginia, Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett tells "How I became an Authoress," and Frank R. Stockton has written reminiscences of his youth and early struggles in the profession of literature.

No need to remove the chimney when lighting the Miller Lamp, while its screw and plunge lift for regulating the wick and its simple design for reworking make it emphatically the best.

Littell's Living Age for 1896. Founded in 1844, this sterling magazine will soon enter its fifty-third year of a continuous and successful career seldom equalled. This standard weekly is the oldest, as it is the best, concentration of choice periodical literature printed in this country. Those who desire a thorough compendium of all that is admirable and noteworthy in the literary world will be spared the trouble of wading through the sea of reviews and magazines published abroad; for they will find the essence of all compacted and concentrated here.

To those whose means are limited it must meet with especial favor, for it offers them what could not otherwise be obtained except by a large outlay. Intelligent readers who want to save time and money will find it invaluable.

Its prospectus for the coming year, printed in another column, presents a feature of unusual interest; for its publishers announce a reduction in price from $8.00 to $6.00 a year. For the amount and quality of the reading furnished, the new price makes THE LIVING AGE the cheapest as well as the best literary weekly in existence. Reduced clubbing rates with other periodicals offer still greater inducements, and to new subscribers remitting now for the year 1896 the intervening numbers will be sent gratis. Littell & Co., Boston, are the publishers.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

At Charlestown, N.H., 12th inst., in the Unitarian church, by Rev. T. D. Howard, Nahum Charles Dodge, of Springfield, Vt., and Mary S. Miner, of Charlestown. At Charlestown, N.H., 18th inst., by Rev. T. D. Howard, Samuel A. Nye and Gracie E. Rumwell, both of Acworth, N.H.

Deaths.

In Athol, 12th inst., Earl H. Goodrich, 34 yrs. In Winchester, 6th inst., Mrs. Margaret S. Kitson, aged 74 yrs., 11 mos., 6 days, wife of Lewis A. Bruce, and daughter of the late Capt. Thomas Kitson. In Baltimore, 12th inst., Susan Mayhew, daughter of the late George N. and Susan B. Eaton.

In Asheville, N.C., 14th inst., Mrs. Eva Wilson Case, wife of Everett Case.

The death of Mrs. Case occurred after a lingering sickness of two years. The deceased was an active member of the Unitarian church of Troy, N.Y., and was well known. She had a most lovable disposition, and possessed many excellent traits of character which endeared her to all. She is survived by her husband, two daughters, Mrs. Fish of Dedham, Mass., and Miss Case of Philadelphia, and one son, John D. Case of Grand Rapids, Mich.

Religious Notices.

THE address of Rev. O. K. Crosby is Yarmouth, Me.

THE address of Rev. Herman Haugerud is 1328 9th Street, South, Minneapolis, Minn.

Atheletes

☆ Appreciate

the benefits to be derived from Bovinine. A well-known champion bicyclist heartily commends it. Fred Titus, of the Spaulding Racing Team says, "I have been taking Bovinine while training, am surprised at the strength and renewed vigor I derived from its use. It is grand to take after hard riding, as it very soon restores the life you lose at such times."

Bovinine

is strictly and solely a food stimulant, prepared by a special cold process from lean, raw beef. Its great blood and flesh creating qualities combined with the ease with which it is digested, makes it invaluable as a restorer of depleted tissues, and as strength-maintainer in all cases of exhaustion, whether caused by disease or over-exertion. All Druggists.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

For the Christian Register.
AT BREAK OF DAY.

BY MARY S. BACON.

O little birds that wake and sing,
 That madly sing at break of day,
 My waking heart can scarce endure
 The heavenly sweetness of your lay.

Upon the mountains, flushed and still,
 One late star hangs, then sinks away;
 Across the glowing sky the dawn
 Casts streaming signals of the day.

Save your bright notes, dear singing-birds,
 No sound is in the wondering air;
 The world lies wrapped in wearied sleep,
 Scarce resting from unceasing care.

A bird sang in my nest one day,
 The mists hung darkling at the dawn:
 She felt no lack of light and love
 As she all joyously sang on.

She sang until a storm arose,
 Dashed the poor earth-made nest away;
 And now where skies are free she sings
 At break of an immortal day.

Colorado Springs.

EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH.

BY REV. A. D. MAYO.

The President's Thanksgiving proclamation is a warning that Thanksgiving Day is the practical limit of our "vacation of work" in Boston, our understanding of "vacation" for the last fifteen years being "working like a horse" from Independence till Thanksgiving Day in Boston, as a preparation for working like a span of horses the rest of the year down South. In our "account of stewardship," last July, we informed the readers of the Christian Register, "outside of our own personal earnings, we should have on Thanksgiving Day $2,500, as the minimum outfit for the work of the present year," our mission year meaning from July 1, 1895, to July 1, 1896.

We take this opportunity to thank old and new friends of the work for their remembrance since our July call, and are happy to say that our own contribution of paying work to the collection is more encouraging than in any former year. But the entire sum of $2,500 mentioned still lacks somewhat of being made up. As every day until December 1 is booked for two days' work, will not such of the readers of the Register as have not already or before favored us ask themselves if there is any better way of "laying up treasure in heaven" than sending to our address, No. 25 Beacon Street, Rooms of American Unitarian Association, their donation, however moderate, to the general fund? If anybody is afraid of being asked next year, we will suggest that money sent without the donor's name is receivable throughout the length and breadth of Dixie. We make no comparison between our own "ministry" and the excellent work done in the great and little schools for the colored folk or the devoted labors of our Unitarian missionary to "boost" the solid South above its present dead level of "evangelical" theology. We only say, first, that, as far as we know, our own ministry of education is the only direct method by which our people can contribute to the building up of the people's common school in every State of the South, and that, from every point of view, the progress of this entire region depends more on this than on any or all other influences, public, private, or ecclesiastical.

Second, journeying through these sixteen States, all of which have been visited within the past fifteen years, our religious and political opinions nowhere concealed, we address every year, through sermons and lectures in the churches of every Christian and Hebrew denomination, save the two or three to whose pulpit no speaker save the priest of the church is admitted, more people of "all sorts and conditions," including the most influential classes, than the entire congregations of our own churches in every Southern State and border city.

Third, the final result of the admirable school work for the colored race, to which our Unitarian people are contributing their thousands every year, depends on the increasing disposition of the masses of the white Southern people to support the common schools, where the graduates of Hampton, Tuskegee, Atlanta, and Calhoun must find their chief opportunity for work that tells on the general uplift of their people. Our work is just at this point, and the recognition of its value is so well known that it is unnecessary to quote testimonials to the readers of the Register. Surely, a call for the $500 that would make November 28 for us a day of genuine "thanksgiving and praise" is not crowding anybody or getting in the way of any good cause, but simply asking for an investment to that extent in what every intelligent worker in the Southern field will acknowledge a hearty and useful co-operation.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETING AT WASHINGTON.

The meeting to consider the proposed consolidation of guilds, Unity Clubs, and other young people's societies, was called to order at 2.30 p.m. October 22, by Rev. Thomas Van Ness, in a brief statement of the object of the meeting. The meeting was organized by the election of Mr. George W. Stone as chairman and Rev. J. M. Scott as secretary. Rev. C. R. Eliot, in behalf of a committee from existing young people's societies, made the following statement:—

I have been asked to give a brief account of the steps which have led up to the present meeting, in order that those present to-day may understand its motive and purpose.

In May last, at the annual meeting of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs, held in Boston, a vote was passed as follows: that a committee of three be appointed, consisting of Rev. C. R. Eliot, Rev. L. B. Macdonald, and Miss Kate L. Brown, to confer with a similar committee to be chosen by the National Guild Alliance in regard to a union or closer co-operation of these two organizations, and to report at the annual meetings in May, 1896.

According to this request the Guild Alliance, through its president, appointed a committee of three, consisting of Rev. Thomas Van Ness, Rev. George W. Cooke, and Mrs. Laura B. Martine.

This joint committee held its first meeting in June, and after considerable discussion came to the general conclusion that it would be wise, if possible, to bring about a closer co-operation of guilds and Unity Clubs and other young people's societies, and that all legitimate means be taken to further such a union.

The summer intervening, no meeting of this committee was held until October.

In the mean time this idea of co-operation or union, this hope of a national union of Unitarian young people, took hold of many minds, at the Unitarian headquarters and out in the field. Its spread was hastened by the great gathering of Christian Endeavor Societies and of the Universalists' Young People's Christian Union held in Boston in July.

The result of this growing enthusiasm was several conferences between Mr. Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, Mr. Stone, treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, and Mr. Horton, president of the Sunday School Society, Mr. Van Ness, president of the Unity Club Bureau, and Mr. Macdonald, president of the National Guild Alliance, which conference resulted in calling this meeting at Washington, for consultation with representatives of the Unitarian young people from other States.

After this step had been taken, it became evident to the joint committee above referred to that some sort of informal statement of its opinion would be expected, and would be of value in giving point and purpose to this meeting, especially as those who called this meeting had certain propositions to make.

Understand, therefore, that this committee has no authority to express final opinion to-day, nor to urge any plan upon this meeting, having been instructed to report to the guilds and Unity Clubs next May. It may be said that at least four of its members concur in the following opinions:—

1. We believe that the time has come for some forward movement in the direction of organizing our Unitarian young people. We believe that new life may be infused into existing organizations, and many new young people's societies formed, if the denomination as a whole will unite in such a purpose.

2. We believe that the work done hitherto by our Unity Clubs, guilds, and other young people's societies, has been most admirable. It is because of this good work that we think the hour has come for a closer union and a united forward move.

3. We heartily believe that the centre about which our young people wish to rally is the religious motive; and we see evidence of this, not only in the success of such bodies as the Christian Endeavor Society, but in our own guilds, which have always centralized their efforts upon the religious life. We believe, therefore, that, whatever forward step may be taken, it should be toward this end. It not only should not interfere with the existing guilds, but it should make the guild idea central.

4. We therefore feel inclined to concur in the proposition to be made, as we understand, by those in charge of this meeting; namely, that a national organization of young people's societies be formed, to be called the Young People's Unitarian Union. We are in sympathy with the purpose proposed by the Union. We believe it to be one to which all the guilds now existing can give their allegiance, and with which other young people's societies can readily agree.

Brief and earnest addresses were made, indorsing the need and idea of such organized union by Rev. L. B. Macdonald, Rev. Edward A. Horton, Rev. A. W. Gould, and Rev. B. F. McDaniel.

The following suggested plan for the organization of such a union was read by Mr. Van Ness:—

YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNITARIAN UNION.

Alliance of Head, Heart, and Hand for Truth and the Right.

The object of this Union shall be to strengthen the young people of the Unitarian denomination, in order that they may do more and better work for the kingdom of God.

Holding, in accordance with the teachings of Jesus, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man, each branch of this Union promises to take part in some religious, philanthropic, or charitable activity connected with the Unitarian Church or with the cause at large.

THE CARDINAL PRINCIPLES.

The cardinal principles of this Union shall be Truth, Service, Righteousness.

I. TRUTH.—"Know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

"Thy law is the truth."

"Search for truth."

"Revelation is not sealed:

Answering unto man's endeavor,

Truth and right are still revealed."

—Longfellow.

Every member of the Unitarian Union is urged to aid the cause of truth, either (a) by reading each week some Unitarian or other religious literature, (b) by disseminating the same, or (c) by joining in some study class connected with the church, which shall have for its object the direct furtherance of religious truth.

II. SERVICE.—"I came that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." "To work is to pray." Save others, and thus thyself.

"Heaven's gate is shut to him who comes alone:

Save thou a soul, and it shall save thine own."

Every member is urged to take part in some religious or charitable activity, or else strive to bring to the Sunday services some stranger or person unacquainted with Unitarian thought and life.

III. RIGHTEOUSNESS.—"Be ye perfect even as your Father in heaven is perfect." "Character is the man." Saved by the life.

Every member promises to attend the particular Unitarian church in his town or city at least once a week, or, failing to possess such a church in the vicinity, to engage in some devotional exercise which shall keep in memory the great principles of life and duty for which the Unitarian church is founded.

Rev. L. W. Sprague offered the following resolution, which was adopted:—

Resolved, That the plan presented through Mr. Van Ness by the Joint Committee, appointed last May by the National Bureau of Unity Clubs and the National Guild Alliance, appeals to the representatives of our churches, guilds, and other organizations here present as practical; and

Resolved, That we adopt it as a general plan of action, referring it back to the said committee for them to consider an ultimate plan of organization, we returning to our various fields, and doing what we can to perfect organizations in sympathy with this general scheme.

Voted to adjourn to meet October 23 at 2.30 p.m.

The adjourned meeting was called to order by the president at 2.30 p.m.; and the minutes of the yesterday's meeting were read, including Mr. Eliot's statement of the reasons for calling this meeting, and Mr. Van Ness's suggested plan for organization.

This was followed by a general discussion, without motion, as to the plan and name,—chiefly in regard to the name, the line of thought dividing between wanting the Unitarian name and the desire for some other name which would make the work of organization easier in the newer fields.

Mr. Gould offered the following resolution, which was adopted:—

Resolved, That the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, recognizing the great need of religious training for our young people and the great good already accomplished in some of our churches by guilds and other organizations for that purpose, earnestly urges upon all of our churches the desirability of trying to start some form of young people's religious societies.

Mr. Sprague offered the following, which was carried:—

Moved that the committee to whom this matter of a national organization was referred shall be enlarged to include the president of the Sunday School Society, the secretary and the treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, Rev. A. W. Gould, Rev. Mary A. Safford, and Rev. Earl M. Wilbur.

Moved by Rev. C. R. Weld, and carried:—

That persons in this meeting and others interested be requested to send to this committee their suggestions of a name for the national organization.

Moved by Mr. Sprague, and carried:—

That the committee to whom this matter is referred be instructed to report to a meeting called to assemble in Boston during Anniversary Week next May; and

That the committee be instructed to send to the secretary of each young people's organization in our denomination a copy of a proposed constitution; and

That an attempt be made to secure representation of each young people's society at the meeting to be called in May.

Moved and carried that this meeting adjourn without day.

The Committee on Organization held a meeting in Washington, and organized by electing Rev. Thomas Van Ness chairman and Rev. George W. Cooke secretary. A committee, consisting of Rev. E. A. Horton, Rev. A. W. Gould, and Mr. George W. Stone, was appointed, to prepare a circular to all ministers and young people's societies, setting forth the importance of the work of such societies and urging their organization. A committee, consisting of Rev. Thomas Van Ness, Rev. Mary A. Safford, and Rev. L. B. Macdonald, was appointed to draft a constitution and by-laws for a national organization, and submit it to the whole committee for consideration. The following resolutions were unanimously passed:—

Resolved, That the union committee be requested to correspond with the officers of the local conferences, asking them to give place on their programmes for the consideration of the question of the formation of young people's religious societies within their respective conference limits.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee that the proposed organization shall be national in its character and denominational in its aims.

The resolution offered by Rev. A. W. Gould, asking of the National Conference the recognition of the interests of the young people, was presented to that body by Col. Carroll D. Wright, and was unanimously adopted as the sense of the Conference.

Any suggestions as to name and place of

Thanksgiving China and Glass

Intending buyers of Dinner Sets, Course Sets, or matchings to the Table China or Glassware, will find in our Dinner Set Department a stock adapted to every want in this line, whether the ordinary or the finest.

Course Sets, Deep Shell China Oyster Plates, Soup Sets, Fish Sets, Entree Sets, Roast Sets, Salad Sets, Game Sets, Pudding Sets, Ice Cream Sets, Fruit Sets, A. D. Coffee Sets.

Table Glassware of every kind, from low cost to the choice cut.

In the Lamp Department (Gallery) are exhibited an extensive variety gleaned from England, France, Germany, and America.

By steamers "Nestor" from Hong Kong, the "Keemun" from Yokohama, the "Armenian" from Liverpool, the "Chateau Lafite" from Bordeaux, the "La Touraine" from Havre, and the sailing ship "J. B. Thomas" from Hiogo, we have landed importations which complete the largest, most valuable, and comprehensive stock ever shown by us, and to which we invite inspection and comparison of values.

One price in plain figures, and we are not undersold if we know it.

Jones, McDuffee & Stratton,
CHINA, GLASS, and LAMPS,
120 FRANKLIN.

organization should be sent to the secretary of the committee, Rev. George W. Cooke, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Literature.

A VICTORIAN ANTHOLOGY. 1837-95. Edited by Edmund Clarence Stedman, author of "Victorian Poets." Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—Mr. Stedman offers his book as a volume of "selections illustrating the editor's critical review of British poetry in the reign of Victoria." Its value, however, is quite independent of that admirable book. There are many who delight in poetry for one who delights in the criticism of it, even by a hand so skilled as Mr. Stedman's. In making this anthology, Mr. Stedman has done a great service to society. Many, of course, will question the proportionate amount of space allotted to this or that poet. They will think that Mr. Stedman would have done better to consult his own taste more freely, feeling sure that in many cases the relative proportions reflect the popular standing of the poets rather than his own. Would it not have been better for him to do something to correct the popular judgment? And, then, as to the selections made from the various authors: frequently the reader will find himself asking, "Why this, and not that?" Often, no doubt, the answer is that the better known thing has been avoided, the endeavor being made to widen the range of the reader's acquaintance. Here and there the preference is unaccountable. Why, for example, when Aubrey De Vere has written so many strong and lovely things, should the sonnet on Cardinal Manning have been chosen,—a piece of nauseating flattery to the effect that in Manning Aquinas and Dante were united? Some one said the same thing of Jonathan Edwards long ago, and of him it was measurably true. There were elements in him that suggested both the angelic doctor and the Florentine. But what there was in Manning to justify the flattery it is hard to see. Moreover, except as a puff for Manning, the sonnet has no reason to exist. It has no poetry in it to justify its absurdity. Some of the selections in their meagreness are hard on reputations that were considerable in their day. Thus there are only two pieces from Lord Houghton's many. But from Landor we have about fifty pieces,—his tiny skiffs that keep afloat when all his great three-deckers have gone down. The material is divided and subdivided in an interesting and effective manner. First we have one hundred and eighty-four pages devoted to "The Early Years of the Reign"; and these are divided into "Distinctive Poets and Dramatists," "Poets of Quality," "The Roisterers," etc. The next general division is "The Victorian Epoch," led off by Tennyson, this followed by "The Close of the Era" and "The Colonial Poets." Under each of these general divisions there are various subdivisions reflecting the clearness of analysis that Mr. Stedman has brought from his critical studies of poetry. A double pleasure awaits the reader of this delightful book,—that of meeting again many old friends, and that of making many new ones; for the reader must be exceedingly well read who does not find many beautiful things here that he has not seen before. The book is of generous bulk (744 pages). It has a fair outside and a large, open page. An admirable picture of Queen Victoria serves for frontispiece, and on the title-page there is a beautiful photogravure of the "Poets' Corner" in Westminster Abbey. Surely, here is a book which no gentleman's library can afford to be without, if the gentleman is a lover of the poets.

REMINISCENCES. By Thomas M. Clark, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Rhode Island. New York: Thomas Whittaker.—Looking at the picture of Bishop Clark, which fronts the title-page of his pleasant book, we should take him for a Roman Catholic prelate, so strongly Celtic is his face. Indeed, but for the Episcopal toggery, we should think he was some Tammany chief, so much less does he look the ecclesiastic than the genial politician. Moreover, something of this sort is true of the picture which the good bishop has painted of himself in his "Reminiscences." It is the picture of a man who never took himself with the tremendous seriousness of the average bishop of the English Church in America. Had he taken to politics instead of to the Church, his success would probably have been more brilliant. That his life would have been happier we are permitted to entertain a doubt. It has apparently been very happy as actually spent. Evidently, he would have been well content to go along in the old way; but, if he has not taken kindly to the Romanizing of his Church, he has not disquieted himself in vain. The several accounts of great ecclesiastical functions are in agreeable contrast with the manner of A. H. K. Boyd, "the Country Parson," and others of his cloth. They tend to minimize the glory of such things rather than to exalt it. So with the comment upon the bishop's ecclesiastical contemporaries. It is sometimes very amusing, and nowhere more so than in the account of Bishop Eastburn; and the best touch in the book is that concerning the intelligent English lady who was always profited by his discourses, such was the benefit of the discipline she got in trying to follow him. Bishop Griswold feared the distraction of much dining out; but in the course of many years he got but one invitation, and that from one of his own clergy. Verily, the Boston of those days was not "given to hospitality." But, then, it was well known that the bishop's table-talk was heavier than lead. The concluding chapter is on "Phillips Brooks"; and it suffers from the fact that much of it is taken from a memorial discourse, and has not the colloquial freedom which is so engaging elsewhere in the book.

THE JOURNAL OF COUNTESS FRANCOISE KRASINSKA. Translated from the Polish by Kasimir Dziekonska. Chicago: McClurg & Co. $1.25.—What a fascinating story have we here! A little eighteenth-century countess of sixteen—who afterward became the great-grandmother of Victor Emmanuel—takes us most heartily into her confidence; and with her we dance in the old castle and run in the woods, "in morning gowns, without stays, puffs, coiffures, or high-heeled shoes." We enjoy the excitement of her sister's wedding, pitying her because she is marrying a solemn man who does not care for dancing! The vivid picture of Polish court life is most interesting, but the chief charm is the sweet personality of the little Framulka. Though she becomes the greatest belle in Warsaw, she retains the same simplicity that she showed when her honored mother graciously permitted her second daughter to help her. "Twice already I have had the key of the medicine closet intrusted to me, and I really think since then I have grown more serious." Her romantic admiration for the young Duke Charles of Courland, the king's son, is the key-note of her story. She wonders if she shall ever see him. How charming he must be! How proud of him is his father! Consequently, we anticipate the end before she does. The journal breaks off abruptly when the countess is eighteen. As the translator tells us, "Continual sorrows and misfortunes took away her strength and her wish to write about them any more." Yet we are assured that, after sad years of wandering, our lovely countess finally had a happy home in Dresden; and, furthermore, it is shown that the king and queen of Italy are the great-great-grandchildren of Françoise Krasinska.

THE GARDEN BEHIND THE MOON. Written and illustrated by Howard Pyle. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—It is interesting to follow the clever artist of the pencil into the mazes of literature. But Mr. Pyle's venture here is not quite clear. His spiritual suggestions will hardly be followed by the little children, who crave the mythical; and older boys and girls, who might discern the beautiful truths woven with the fable, will be a little impatient with the imaginary part. There are touching and exquisite passages, and the spirit throughout is sweet, pure, and humane. Lovers of the immortal "Wonder Book" will hardly forgive the translation of their beloved "Pegasus" into the "Black-winged Horse," even though "Pegasus" shines all the brighter by contrast. And the severe moralist will shrink with horror at the marriage of the half-witted youth to the beautiful princess, even if such an unhallowed consummation takes place only in the "Garden behind the Moon." With ninety-six thousand souls in the United States, each of whom might be called a "moon-calf," there is a sad reality to be considered. Mr. Pyle might think that the expression of such views fulfilled his prophecy: "I dare say there are some wise folk who will tell you that it is all nonsense. Well, well, may be it is all nonsense; but sometimes there is more solid truth in a little nonsense than in a whole peck of potatoes."

THE POWER OF SILENCE. An Interpretation of Life in its Relation to Health and Happiness. By Horatio W. Dresser. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street.—This book is conceived very much in the spirit of those who are devoted to the ideas of mental healing and Christian Science. But every scheme of thought is subject to the individuality of the person holding it and expounding it. Every scheme has interpreters so simple and sincere, or so eloquent and persuasive, that we are almost persuaded to join ourselves to their assembly. Mr. Dresser brings to the exposition of his scheme an individuality that would give to any scheme he might adopt a charm peculiar to himself. We may or may not go with him the length of his conclusions: we may accept much of what is most peculiar in them, or little. But one must be strangely unsympathetic who can read this book without finding many things in its plea for "a wise passiveness" that commend themselves as sound and good and expressive of what he has himself dimly felt after, and nearly come upon, or quite, many and many a time. One thing that helps is a certain pleasant harmony between the matter of the book and its form. The tone is very quiet; and, if sometimes the meaning is extremely vague, it is with a pleasant vagueness. We are invited to feel that we are in a good world, and that it is not by anxious striving that we get the best it has to give, but by doing the duties nearest to our hand, and trusting for the rest.

SONGS FROM THE NORTH. Vol. I. Collected and edited by Valborg Hovind Stub. Minneapolis: Century Piano Company. $2.—Very welcome is this collection of Scandinavian songs. Though Americans have long loved Grieg and Kjerulf and Ole Bull, they have had little opportunity to know many of the minor writers of Northern song. Mrs. Aubertine Woodward Moore (Auber Forestier) has furnished the songs with English text, and her translations are most apt and musical. So at last we, too, shall be able to sing these lovely songs in our own language. To those who are familiar with Grieg and his school the book will come as an old friend: to those who are not it opens an enchanting vista of appreciation. It must have been hard to choose from so many good things, but the choice has been well made. There is a literary as well as a musical interest in the English versions of the songs and the biographical sketches of the composers which accompany their portraits. The edition, in flexible covers (price $2.50), will make a charming Christmas gift for the singing daughters of the family. A second volume will appear later.

THE STICKIT MINISTER. By S. R. Crockett. Illustrated Edition. New York: Macmillan & Co. Paper, 50 cents.—The sketches themselves are happily the same familiar stories; but the illustrations which appear now for the first time are characteristic and attractive. Though the work of nine or ten artists, all lovers of the Stickit Minister and the "common men," the illustrations are remarkably harmonious. There are glimpses of old Edinburgh, sketchy bits of the Galloway moors, the Duchra, the Nether Dullarg, and the Manse of the Marrow Kirk, and the other places that we know so well. There is a prefatory poem by Robert Louis Stevenson,—to whom the book is dedicated,—the last verse of which is touching enough,—

"Be it granted me to behold you again in dying, Hills of home! and to hear again the call,—
Hear about the graves of the martyrs the pee-wees crying,—
And hear no more at all!"

UNC' EDINBURG: A PLANTATION ECHO. By Thomas Nelson Page. Illustrated by B. W. Clinedinst. Charles Scribner's Sons.—"Tis hard to spile Christmas, anyways," is the doctrine promulgated by

Unc' Edinburg in the opening sentence of Mr. Page's charming book. But there are books that help to "spile" it,—gift books that lack intrinsic merit. "Unc' Edinburg" is not one of these. It is a book to warm the cockles of the heart. The story is told entirely by Unc' Edinburg, as he drives the author, in forma, to Wenowcoke from the railroad station. We must confess that sometimes his Negro dialect is not a little baffling. It becomes a subject of domestic conference; and, if the conference ends in victory at last, that is an added joy. Plantation manners may not have made good life; but they make good literature, when such a master plays as Mr. Page. The illustrator has seconded his text most admirably. Many will follow the example of "Marse George," and fall in love with Miss Charlotte, as she comes down the steps, "smilin'."

THE BACHELOR'S CHRISTMAS, AND OTHER STORIES. By Robert Grant. Illustrated by C. D. Gibson and others. Charles Scribner's Sons.—These stories have all enjoyed the currency of one or another of the magazines, and they now make their appeal to a much smaller company in such a beautiful book that it lends a grace beyond itself to the matter it contains. They are of different degrees of excellence, "An Eye for an Eye," the second on the list, being the last in point of merit. The story which names the book is the pleasantest of all; and the most amusing is "The Matrimonial Tontine Benefit Association," an institution for delaying matrimony, the last married to have all the money in the pool. When only two were left, there were some very interesting complications; and the man who got the pool waited too long for it, and missed the girl he meant to marry, after all. One must not come to these stories expecting too much, or he may possibly be disappointed. But they are very bright and entertaining and amusing.

CONSTANTINOPLE. By F. Marion Crawford. Illustrated by Edwin L. Weeks. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—The best part of Mr. Crawford's "Constantinople" are the illustrations by Mr. Weeks, which reveal the spirit of that city much better than the text. Indeed, Constantinople is a series of pictures. It is one of the most pictorial and kaleidoscopic cities in Europe, and one of the dirtiest. Mr. Crawford writes too much from the outside to give us an inside view. He is a Turkophile, and abuses the Greeks and the Armenians, who, he says, have given the Turks a bad name by calling themselves Turks, and sometimes by misgoverning his country. But, if the author had had a real taste of what the Turkish government is, he would pass this off for reportorial sarcasm. A slight experience with a Turkish court of justice or a Turkish prison would probably cure him of such ideas.

A Young Girl's Library

BY THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON

The best ten, fifteen, twenty-five, fifty and one hundred books. A moderate library completely outlined in the November

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 Cents on all News-stands

The Curtis Publishing Company

Philadelphia

THE NIMBLE DOLLAR. By Charles Miner Thompson. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.—Most of these stories, if not all, have already appeared in the Youth's Companion, which is perhaps as good a guarantee of their merit as any boy would ask. They are original in conception, and offer no examples of the wild Indian or hair-breadth escape type of book, depending rather on some not impossible but hitherto unthought of complication for their interest. The longest story, which gives the book its name, is perhaps the least interesting; though the idea itself is as well worth developing as any of the others. The story of the boy who wanted to be a reporter, that of the young man who was well punished for frightening his little brother, and the tangled web woven by the boy betrayed into an untruth seem to us the brightest of the lot.

THE RED BADGE OF COURAGE. By Stephen Crane. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.—In this remarkable account of what is called an episode in our Civil War there is none of that glamour sometimes thrown around battle scenes by a romantic imagination, or even by the partial mellowing that comes in the lapse of years. This is realism of the most uncompromising sort. It tells the inner history of a young private through the three days of fighting that followed a long period of inaction. It is surprisingly well done, and shows a vigor and sincerity that makes one forget certain faults of style and imperfect English, if indeed these do not add insensibly to the realism of the book. It is alive with the suppressed passion of actual experience.

MASTER AND MAN. By Lyof N. Tolstoi. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—One lays down this little book with the sensation that he has experienced a bit of Russian life. The story could be told in a few words: a sledge journey results in the freezing to death of a man and a horse. But with what inimitable skill it is told! The reader will not lay it down till the last page is finished, and not a word can be skipped. Not only is the picture of a Russian winter storm admirable, but the spirit and character of master and man are delineated with masterly skill. The money-loving master, the passive, patient serving-man, the comfortable villagers, the nervous wife, are living personalities.

MISS JERRY. By Alexander Black. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.—The first "picture play" was originated by Mr. Black last year, and was so successful that the author has published the story in book form. Though the printed pages cannot reproduce the novel effect of photographic action, one scene melting into another,—"the whole company of actors and a scenic and spoken drama comprised in a traveling equipment of two men and a magic lantern,"—yet the illustrations taken from life give a suggestion of the whole. Miss Jerry is a sweet and unaffected girl, and the story is simply and naturally told.

THE CHILD'S GARDEN OF SONG. Selected and arranged by William L. Tomlins. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $2.—For kindergartens and children's singing classes the simplicity of these songs is well adapted; and, though the tunes are somewhat monotonous, the words are very good. The designs by Ella Ricketts are attractive and pleasing.

Books and Authors.

"Listener," in the Transcript of Saturday, November 9, thus speaks of a young Boston poet: "If it were not that the priesthood of nature exacts a continual advance from generation to generation,—a steady readjustment of thought and expression to suit the powerful ebb and flow of the spiritual cravings of man,—one might almost fancy an old Druid re-embodied in Mr. Philip Henry Savage, the young poet of Boston, whose volume of verse the 'Listener' has just taken up. Here is certainly a high priest of nature,—a bard who understands the innermost mysteries! But, if he is a Druid, he is one who knows very intimately the spirit of this time,—this moment, when a world bereaved of its idols sighs for a new god, when it will not have any old god in a new guise, when it looks with yearning eyes into the woods and hills and brooks for its divinity, and, though seeing more there than even Wordsworth or Emerson saw, and rejoicing in it, and at times giving itself utterly to the revelation, yet turns away again, only half daring to believe. Mr. Savage is a pantheist,—that needs hardly to be said of any poet of nature at this day; but, though he sees and sings the 'little god within the brook,' which is the fish, and truly feels his own heart beating within the golden breast of the meadow-lark, he must now and then lament the other gods he has lost. What is there in recent verse that surpasses in fine audacity the idea contained in the following lines? Mr. Savage first compares his heart to the dead leaf that rolls along the ground:—

"Green faded into red, and red to brown;
Life to decay, and death the latest crown!
So is my life, and lacks the heart of power
Here to lift up the god that's fallen down.

"Alas! why, in the days of mighty Jah,
Did I pull down thy pillars, Asherah?
Baal, where art thou? Egypt, even thou
Hadst faith for me beneath the wings of Ptah!"

It is not always in this regretful spirit, however, by any means, that Mr. Savage writes. His moods, especially when he writes of the early spring and the early morning and the great mountains, are often joyous. There are some fine sonnets in the book; and the 'Listener,' who feels particularly grateful to Mr. Savage for writing much about his own mountain of mountains, which is Moosilauke, would like to quote some passages which refer to it. But this he cannot do. The public, no doubt, will be interested, and will have a right to be interested in the verses wherein the poet refers to his father, Rev. Minot J. Savage. The lines that are inscribed 'To M. J. S.' end with a couplet which may, indeed, become famous,—

"The heart that travels seaward brings
The dearest treasure home to land!"

The appearance of the little book is a literary event of the first importance."

GOOD MUSIC

"Selected Gems and Modern Favorites."

For Church or Parlor Organ. By J. C. Macy. A most complete and excellent collection for young organists. Contains voluntaries, preludes, postludes, festival, and wedding music, marches, pieces for special occasions, and many delightful miscellaneous selections. 94 pieces, 112 pages. Many of the themes have never before been arranged for the reed organ. Beautifully printed. Boards, $1.50, postpaid.

"Choice Sacred Solos."

Vol. 1. 39 songs for soprano and tenor. Vol. 2. 40 songs for alto, baritone, and bass. Made up of the best modern sacred compositions. Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00. Postpaid.

"Royal Collection of Piano Music."

46 easy pianoforte compositions by the best modern composers. The collection has had a great success with piano players everywhere. 160 pages. Beautifully printed. 50 Cents, postpaid.

"Organ at Church and in Concert."

By J. W. Simpson. For pipe or reed organ. A new collection which brings within reach of the ordinary player some of the finest organ music published in years. Not difficult and of great variety. 74 Pieces. Cloth, $2.00, postpaid.

"College Songs."

Latest edition. 92 songs, including all the famous favorites. This collection is the most popular ever published, having reached its 41st edition. Over 300,000 copies sold. 50 Cents, postpaid.

Any music-book or piece of music published throughout the world can be procured of us at shortest notice and lowest cost.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

THE FAMOUS

Capt. January Series

By LAURA E. RICHARDS.

"She has made for herself a little niche apart in the literary world from her delicate treatment of New England village life."—Boston Post.

NAUTILUS. A new volume, larger and handsomer than its predecessors, but very much in the same vein,—not a child's story, but it appeals to the sympathies of all.

Illustrated from original drawings. Small 4to, cloth, unique cover design. 75c.

MELODY. The story of a child. Illustrated Holiday edition. Printed from entirely new plates, and illustrated with thirty half-tone pictures from drawings by Frank T. Merrill.

This quaintly pretty, touching, old-fashioned story is told with perfect grace.—Milwaukee Sentinel. 4to, cloth, with a handsome cover design. $1.25. Also square 16mo, without illustrations. 50c.

JIM OF HELLAS, and a companion story, BETHSaida Pool.

Two bright new stories sure of a warm welcome from the thousands of readers who look forward, with keen anticipations of pleasure, for the appearance of any new volume from the same pen. Square 16mo, cloth. 50c.

MARIE — NARCISSA. Two charming new volumes to "CAPTAIN JANUARY" and "MELODY." It is perfectly safe to predict that no one who picks either volume up and commences to read will drop it until it has been read to a finish. Each complete in 1 volume. 16mo, cloth. 50c.

CAPT. JANUARY. 78th Thousand. One of the most charming Idylls of recent times, whose success is something phenomenal. 16mo, cloth. 50c.

SAME. Holiday edition illustrated by Frank T. Merrill. 4to, cloth. $1.25.

WHEN I WAS YOUR AGE. A bright story of the author's child life. Fully illustrated. $1.25.

GLIMPSES OF THE FRENCH COURT: Sketches from French History. With portraits in photogravure. 12mo, cloth. $1.50.

For sale by booksellers generally, or sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price by the Publishers.

ESTES & LAURIAT, Boston.

and Roman sellas; Sir Walter Raleigh smoking chairs; Elder Brewster Pilgrim chairs; Colonial models from the Mayflower; high-backs, shape chairs, tabourets, floor chairs, and over eighty unique and rare designs.

PAINE FURNITURE CO., 48 CANAL STREET.

"Of Surpassing Interest."

A Singular Life

By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

Second Edition, 16mo, $1.25.

"It is not the mere story that makes 'A Singular Life' so interesting, but rather the manner of its telling and the richness of detail Mrs. Ward has found in the simple New England life of a hill village and a coast town. The book abounds in sketches of character, some of the lowest types, and touching all grades of society possible in that environment. These all are remarkably good. The descriptive passages are lucid and powerful, and the play of humor is delightful. . . . This very readable story is fresh, bright, graphic, deeply pathetic, eloquent, powerful."—New York Times.

"The hero is a fine conception well sustained, the heroine charming and noble. . . . The book abounds in brilliant and beautiful passages, is intensely interesting, and points a noble moral."—The Congregationalist, Boston.

"As a story 'A Singular Life' is of thrilling interest. As an artistic production it ranks among the best of its author's work."—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

"Even if one should feel obliged to question the reality of certain particulars, the spirit of the book is absolutely good, it being that of one who went about in Palestine doing good many years ago."—Christian Register, Boston.

"Nothing more dramatic than 'A Singular Life' will reach us from the land of new books this year. A fine literary treat awaits every reader of it."—Los Angeles Herald.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent postpaid by
HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,
BOSTON.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crowell Cressey, Ph.D.

In "The Essential Man" Dr. Cressey has given an interesting and profitable study of a problem which can never grow old as long as man is what he is. . . . This little volume is thoroughly modern in tone, absolutely clear, free from either traditionalism or sentimentality, and brings out better than any work of the same size which we know the fundamental facts disclosed by the modern study of mind and nature which lead to a rational assurance of a life to come. If one wished simply to sharpen his own philosophical thinking, he could hardly do better than to test it by the clear propositions of this book.—The Hartford Seminary Record.

It is a healthful and helpful book which no one can read without profit.—The New World.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

A CHAIR SHOW.

Chairs were in use in Egypt three thousand three hundred years before Christ, and in the five thousand years that have elapsed since then there have been countless varieties designed by the ingenious mind of man.

But probably never in all this time, in any age, any country, or any clime has there been gathered together under one roof such a collection of different styles and designs as we have now on exhibition. We display over five hundred varieties.

Chairs of the Tudor, Stuart, and Hanoverian periods; chairs from India, Japan, and Turkey; curules and Roman sellas; Sir Walter Raleigh smoking chairs; Elder Brewster Pilgrim chairs; Colonial models from the Mayflower; high-backs, shape chairs, tabourets, floor chairs, and over eighty unique and rare designs.

A Superb Gift-Book.

A Victorian Anthology.

Selections illustrating the Editor's critical review of British poetry in the reign of Victoria ("Victorian Poets"). Selected and edited by EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN. With brief biographies of the authors quoted, a fine frontispiece portrait of Queen Victoria and a vignette of the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey. Large crown 8vo, bound in attractive library style, $2.50; full gilt, $3.00; half calf, $4.50; full levant, $6.00. Large Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies, printed on paper of the best quality. 2 vols., 8vo, $10.00 net.

A Victorian Anthology.

"Any one who has studied that marvellously delicate and accurate critical review of British poetry during the reign of Victoria by Mr. E. C. Stedman will admit, without a moment's question, that there is no one on either side the Atlantic better fitted than he to edit an anthology of the period, which will give much more than a glimpse into the rich contributions which Great Britain has made in the years 1837-1895 to the literature of the finest of arts,—poetry. Mr. Stedman's 'Victorian Poets' has deservedly become a standard, both in England and America; and his present volume takes its proper place as a companion book, illustrating with delightful and graphic charm the views of the critic."—Boston Advertiser.

A Victorian Anthology.

"No less noticeable than the fine critical taste displayed by Mr. Stedman in making his selections is the conscientiousness which has gone into every detail of his work. It would be difficult to imagine a better made anthology, or one more likely to take a permanent place among standard works of reference. . . . We may well be proud as a nation that such a work for English poetry should have been left for an American to perform. The book is one that will prove simply indispensable to students of poetry and cultivated readers alike."—The Dial, Chicago.

A Victorian Anthology.

"One need not be a constant or a voluminous reader of Victorian poetry to perceive the excellence of Mr. Stedman's 'Anthology,' which represents it, in all its varieties, with a fullness never before attempted. . . . He has accomplished what he intended in a broad, scholarly, catholic spirit; and the result is an admirable book, the accuracy of which may be depended on in historical matters and in the trustworthiness of the biographical notes with which it concludes. Readers of his 'Victorian Poets' will want this 'Victorian Anthology'; and readers of this 'Anthology' will want, if they do not already possess, his 'Victorian Poets.'"—R. H. Stoddard, in N.Y. Mail and Express.

Books of Criticism.

By Mr. STEDMAN.

Victorian Poets. Including Tennyson, Landor, the Brownings, Arnold, Buchanan, Morris, Swinburne, Rossetti, and others. Twenty-first Edition. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.25; half calf, $3.50.

The Nature and Elements of Poetry. With Topical Analysis and Analytical Index. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

Poets of America. Treating Bryant, Whittier, Emerson, Longfellow, Poe, Holmes, Lowell, Whitman, Taylor, etc. Eleventh Edition. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.25; half calf, $3.50.

"Mr. Stedman is the ideal critic: for no other could be named so well equipped, not with knowledge alone, or with the critical faculty, but with the useful tact of pen to supply courage to conviction."—New York Times.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Miscellaneous.

Macmillan & Co. are the American publishers of Dean Farrar's "Julian Home: A Tale of College Life," a new and beautiful edition. If less successful than "Eric; or, Little by Little," because dealing with a more difficult situation, the book is one that has been justified in its passage heretofore through thirteen editions. We fancy that college men have been less taken with it than those anticipating college life. The illustrations are below the level of the matter of the book and its general appearance.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s holiday edition of Mrs. Jane G. Austin's "Standish of Standish: A Story of the Pilgrims" is so beautiful that the reader cannot but be sad that it did not delight the eyes of the author before they closed forever on the scenes whose traditions she had endeavored to perpetuate and adorn, not without good success. "Standish of Standish," if not the best of her novels, has no superior among them; and in these beautiful volumes, with charming photogravure illustrations, many will renew their pleasure in the book, and many more will make its acquaintance for the first time, and wonder that they have not known so good a thing till now.

The republication of G. P. R. James's "Richelieu: A Tale of France," by G. P. Putnam's Sons, is a natural incident of the prevailing inclination of the public to historical romance. Written in 1825, it was the first and one of the best of James's innumerable historical novels. It was read by Sir Walter Scott in manuscript, and received his too generous approval. James has been called "the English Dumas," and there is about as much truth in the epithet as there is generally in epithets of this sort. He has Dumas's skill neither in plot nor description, and still less could he make his people talk well and entertainingly. But he had skill as a narrator, and did much to please an appetite that Scott had first created and then somewhat dulled. It goes without saying that "Richelieu" is better worth reading than many of our recent ventures in this kind; and Messrs. Putnam's edition in two handsome volumes, uniform with their edition of the Tautphoeus novels, is entirely satisfactory.

Literary Notes.

An amusing paper on "The Plague of Jocularly," by the late Prof. H. H. Boyesen, in the November number of the North American Review, attacks the seeming American inability to treat serious things seriously.

Books Received.

From Estes & Lauriat, Boston. Constantinople. The City of the Sultans. By Clara E. Clement. Illustrated. Price $3.00. Ruby's Vacation. By Minnie E. Paull. Price $1.00. From Harper & Brothers, New York. Dixie, or Southern Scenes and Sketches. By Julian Ralph. Illustrated. Dorothy, and Other Italian Stories. By Constance F. Woolson. Illustrated. The Red Cockade. A Novel. By Stanley J. Weyman. Illustrated. From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. The Records and Letters of the Apostolic Age. By Ernest DeWitt Burton. Price $1.50. An Old New England Town. Sketches of Life, Scenery, and Character. By Frank S. Child. With illustrations. Price $2.00. The Amazing Marriage. By George Meredith. 2 vols. Price $2.50. The Private Life of Napoleon. Memoirs of Constant. Translated by Elizabeth G. Martin. 4 vols. Price $5.00. From A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York. The Book of Deuteronomy. By Rev. Andrew Harper, B.D. The Expositor's Bible. From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. The Blessings of Cheerfulness. By J. R. Miller, D.D. Price 35 cents. The Hidden Life. By J. R. Miller, D.D. Price 75 cents. L'Avril. A Novel. Translated from the French of Paul Margueritte by Helen B. Dole. Price $1.00. Tartarin of Tarascon. By Alphonse Daudet. With illustrations. Revised Translation. Price $1.00. Beautiful Houses. A Study in House-buildings. By Louis H. Gibson. With over 200 illustrations. Price $3.00. From Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. Westminster. By Sir Walter Besant, M.A., F.R.S. Lakewood. A Story of To-day. By Mary H. Norris. Illustrated by Louise L. Heustis. The Red Spell. By Francis Gribble. With frontispiece by Frank M. Gregory. Bohemia Invaded, and Other Stories. By James L. Ford. With frontispiece by A. W. B. Lincoln. From Macmillan & Co., New York. The Grey Lady. By Henry Seton Merriman. Price $1.25. The Master of the Musicians. A Story of Handel's Days. By Emma Marshall. With illustrations by A. Ansted. Price $1.50. From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Poets' Dogs. Collected and arranged by Elizabeth Richardson. Mimosa Leaves. By Grace Denio Litchfield. Illustrated by Helen and Margaret Armstrong. From Rand, McNally & Company, Chicago and New York. Headwaters of the Mississippi. By Captain Willard Glazier. Illustrated. From The American Book Company, New York. Electra. Old Greek Stories. Third Reader Grade. By James Baldwin. Price 45 cents. Fairy Stories and Fables. Second Reader Grade. Retold by James Baldwin. Price 35 cents. Stories for Children. First Reader Grade. By Mrs. Charles A. Lane. Price 25 cents.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. have fought a Good Fight. Sacred Solo. For Baritone or Bass in D. By J. Eliot Trowbridge. Jainty Little Maiden. A Dance. For Pianoforte. By Francis M. Paine. A Nineteenth Century March. By Loveland F. Miller. Euphorette. Gavotte. For the Pianoforte. By Sadie Martinot. Melba Waltz. Composed by Luigi Arditi. For Piano. Arranged by Laurence Knight for Four Hands. The same for Two Hands. Jay's Latest Dance. Dance Gavotte. By Flo Denham. Blessed are they that do his Commandments. No. 53. Aria in B-flat. For Tenor or Soprano. Sacred Solo. By J. Eliot Trowbridge.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

By EDWIN A. GROSVENOR,

Professor of European History at Amherst College, formerly Professor of History at Robert College, Constantinople.

With an Introduction by General Lew Wallace.

With two hundred and fifty illustrations of important places, rulers, and noted people of Ancient Constantinople. 2 vols., royal 8vo, cloth, gilt top, $10.00; half morocco, $14.00.

Constantinople, in natural beauty, advantageous situation, and political importance, is the queen of the world. Everybody is interested in it. Everybody has some idea of it. Yet there is no other European capital which is so little known. Its multiplicity of races, languages, and religions, and the peculiar, complicated variety of its history, have rendered real acquaintance almost impossible. This book endeavors to picture as much of the wonderful cosmopolitan city as can be painted on 800 pages. It is a book for all who have interest in the world outside their own door, for the unlearned and the learned, for the traveller, and for him who stays at home. For its composition the author enjoyed every possible advantage. An enthusiastic and laborious student, a long-time resident in Constantinople, familiar with its languages and customs, possessing warm friends of every rank in every nationality, and of every creed, with doors open to him which were commonly shut, no man could be better equipped for the task he has undertaken. Nor did he make his studies and researches alone, without the incentive of congenial and inspiring companionship. General Lew Wallace and Professor Grosvenor worked over the city together through years, the former to collect material for the "Prince of India," the latter for the preparation of this book.

At all Bookstores. Postpaid on receipt of price.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, Publishers, BOSTON.

PILOTS IN THE LIBRARY.

Men and Women who have mastered the most interesting fields of literature have chosen 2,100 works for A LIST OF BOOKS FOR GIRLS AND WOMEN AND THEIR CLUBS, telling about each book or author just what an inquirer wishes to know. Some of the departments:

Fiction, a reviewer for the Nation. History, Reuben G. Thwaites. Natural History, Olive Thorne Miller. Education, Prof. Edward R. Shaw. Fine Art, Russell Sturgis. Music, Henry E. Krehbiel. Country Occupations, Prof. L. H. Bailey. Domestic Economy, Useful Arts and Livelihoods, Augusta H. Leopold. Hints for Girls' and Women's Clubs, with Outline Constitution and By-laws.

Cloth, $1; paper, 50c.

Published for the American Library Association.

Library Bureau, 146 Franklin Street, Boston.

Branches: 273 Stewart Building, New York; 603 Chestnut St., Philadelphia; 125 Franklin St., Chicago; 10 Bloomsbury St., London, W.C.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS

men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times

DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT IN NEW YORK

With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs.

Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott.

A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. $6th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed it." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. Q. We Pay Freight to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Outfit. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A book that ought to be in the hands of every young man in the country.

Turning-points in Successful Careers.

By the Rev. WILLIAM M. THAYER. 16 portraits. 16mo, cloth, $1.50.

The Rev. William M. Thayer, whose works of biography enjoy an almost unequalled reputation in this country, has produced in this new work a most stimulating and profitable book for young readers, to each of whom comes in early life that turning-point which, in the case of most men, brings the one chance, and which only successful men make the home port for fortune.

T. Y. CROWELL & CO., New York and Boston.

Channing Auxiliary Calendar FOR 1896.

RHYMES AND CHIMES.

The Poetry of Steeples,
The Bell in the Belfry.

Beautifully printed in brown on Japanese paper. Boxed. Price $1.00, including postage. Address

CHANNING PUBLISHING COMMITTEE,
1300 Taylor Street, San Francisco.

Price REDUCED from $8.00 to $6.00

THE WORLD'S GREATEST INTELLECTS

CONTRIBUTE TO MAKE THIS PERIODICAL

Encyclopedic in Scope, Character, Completeness, Comprehensiveness.

INDISPENSABLE

to every reader of intelligence and literary taste.

The thoughtful reader will find in

THE LIVING AGE

Food to NOURISH, STIMULATE and INSPIRE THOUGHT
A Weekly Magazine, it gives more than Three and a Quarter Thousand double column octavo pages of reading - matter yearly, forming four large volumes.

It has received the commendations of the highest literary authorities, the most distinguished statesmen, the brightest men and women of the country, and has proven a source of instruction and entertainment to many thousands. It commends itself especially to busy people of moderate means for they will find in it what they cannot otherwise obtain, except by a large expenditure of time and money, yet which is so essential to every one who desires to be well informed concerning all the great questions of the day.

"One may find here all that it is worth his while to know of foreign literature in all its departments."—Advance, Chicago.

"A vast amount of good reading at a merely nominal price."—Boston Advertiser.

"No gentleman's library should be without this eclectic."—The Nation, New York.

Subscription REDUCED from $8.00 to $6.00.

This makes The Living Age absolutely the cheapest magazine published.

Subscribe Now for 1896 and Receive Free the intervening weekly issues of 1895.

Single copies 15c. each.
For sale by all booksellers and newsdealers.

Rates for clubbing THE LIVING AGE with other periodicals will be sent on application. Address,
LITTELL & CO, P.O. Box 5206, Boston.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION

"52 Times a Year."

An unusually strong list of Contributors is announced for the next Volume of THE COMPANION—the 70th year of its publication.

The Princess Louise.

For the coming volume Queen Victoria's daughter, the Princess Louise, in collaboration with her husband, the Marquis of Lorne, has written on a subject of interest to every home.

A Notable Series.

Unusually readable Articles will be given by the Lord Chief Justice of England and Judge Oliver Wendell Holmes on "The Bar as a Profession." Together with Articles by Hon. Thomas B. Reed on "What the Speaker Does" and by Justin McCarthy, M. P., on "How a Prime Minister is Made."

Four Admirals.

Stirring Adventures of Naval Life are described by ADMIRAL A. H. MARKHAM, R. N.
ADMIRAL P. H. COLOMB, R. N.
ADMIRAL T. H. STEVENS, U. S. N.
ADMIRAL SIR GEO. ELLIOT, K. C. B.

Cabinet Ministers.

Hon. Hoke Smith, Secretary of the Interior.
Hon. J. Sterling Morton, Secretary of Agriculture.
Hon. H. A. Herbert, Secretary of the Navy, have written articles expressly for The Companion.

Send for Illustrated Prospectus and Sample Copies Free.

50-ct. CALENDAR FREE

New Subscribers who will cut out this slip and send it AT ONCE with name and address, and $1.75, will receive:
FREE—The Youth's Companion every week till January 1, 1896.
FREE—Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's Double Numbers.
FREE—Our Handsome 4-page Calendar (7 x 10 inches), lithographed in nine colors. Retail price, 50 cents.
AND THE COMPANION 52 weeks, a full year, to Jan. 1, 1897.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, 201 Columbus Ave., Boston, Mass.

Send Check, Post-Office or Express Order, or Registered Letter, at Our Risk.

Distinguished Contributors For 1896.

The Princess Louise.
The Marquis of Lorne.
Lord Chief Justice of England.
Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson.
Secretary of the U. S. Navy.
Secretary of the Interior.
Secretary of Agriculture.
Judge Oliver Wendell Holmes.
Sir William Howard Russell.
Frank R. Stockton.
W. Clark Russell.
General Nelson A. Miles.
Thomas Nast.
Hon. Thomas B. Reed.
The Dean of Salisbury.
Bishop Cleveland Cox.
Bishop W. Crowell Doane.
Sir Edwin Arnold.
Camille Flammarion.
Justin McCarthy.
Admiral Stevens.
Admiral Markham.
Admiral Elliot.
Charles Dickens.
Archibald Forbes.
Frank D. Millet.
Frederic Villiers.
Max O'Rell.
Hiram Maxim.
Andrew Carnegie.
Henry Loomis Nelson.
C. A. Stephens.
Harold Frederic.

And

More than 100 Others.

The Home.

SLOW AND SURE.

[Translated by James Freeman Clarke.]

In forty years of steady work, so Eastern travellers say,
The Chinese make a porcelain cup of Oriental clay:
In Bagdad they form easily a hundred in a day;
But princes seek and prize the one—the other's thrown away.

The chicken walks from out its shell, and goes its food to find,
While helpless lies for months and years the child of human kind,
Which yet, by gradual growth, o'ertops all else in strength and mind.
O slow of thought! remember this,—be thankful and resigned.

—Saadi.

For the Christian Register.

JIM ELKINS'S STRIPES.

BY SARAH BIERCE SCARBOROUGH.

Jim had coveted them from the time he had viewed the first dress parade of the "Wharton Guards," as the company at Wharton School had voted to style themselves.

He had grown up with the company, as he felt; for he had never missed an exercise on the parade ground, which adjoined the pasture back of his aunt's little house on the side hill. He knew every one in the ranks, from tall Jack Barton, whose stiff, soldierly bearing he so much admired, down to Harley Stowe, whom he pitied from the bottom of his heart because he had such a terrible time learning to keep step.

He had followed every new recruit who came to Wharton with both sympathy and impatience, as the young drill-masters put them through the awkward squad,—sympathy for the scathing criticism they poured out upon the learners, and impatience because these clung so long to shuffling steps, unwieldy legs, and crooked shoulders. But he glowed with pride as well, when they were brought out at last, able to take their place in the ranks under Lieut. Kerr, as fit subjects for him to take the remaining kinks out of, preparatory to being invested with the acme of soldierly dignity,—a uniform.

"I wonder if I couldn't make one," Jim ruminated, after drill one day,—an unusually enthusiastic one.

"One what?" demanded his cousin Sally, who shared the fence with him, also his enthusiasm for the Guards, but who was far from fervent concerning any of Jim's aspirations. Jim longed for her sympathy and good comradeship; but her manner rarely failed to express her contempt, if her tongue did not utter it.

"Why, make a soldier," answered Jim. "Not one of them in the ranks,—I wouldn't give shucks for that place,—but one of the fellows with stripes on his sleeves. My!" he ended longingly.

"You'd look pretty with stripes!" Sally flung back the sneering rejoinder. She was fond of throwing his small stature at him. "There wouldn't be room for 'em," she continued tantalizingly. "Not more'n one," she yielded, "and that don't mean nothing. Bob Starr has to have two 'round his wrist just for corporal; and, just for sergeant, Bill Mills wears two upside-down V's on his shoulder."

"I mean to have four V's," Jim stoutly affirmed, hiding his hurt over the first taunt. "That means captain. Three, anyway, for a lieutenant," he conceded.

"How are you going to get 'em?" Sally demanded, with unfeeling triumph.

It was left unanswered. Jim was loath to tell what was in his mind. He and Sally both knew, however, that his aunt would not be able to send him to Wharton. It was entirely out of the question, when she washed for Lieut. Kerr, and when Sally had to tend their baby every Thursday evening, while they went to the hall rehearsals. Still, he did not entirely despair: he could play soldier, at least. And there was where he would have liked to have won Sally's co-operation, or, at least, her approval of his plan. But that was out of the question, too; and he refrained from subjecting himself further to her merciless ridicule.

He knew where he could obtain strips for his trousers,—from his aunt's rag-carpet balls. There was a dirty white cap in the garret, left over from some past political campaign; and his aunt would never suspect its presence in her logwood dye, if discreetly managed. A pair of white gloves, unearthed with the cap, would do capital, after a surreptitious bath in the Monday's boiler; and his uncle's old gun must complete the outfit.

Everything went well in preparation. He would have liked Sally's help when it came to the attachment of the white carpet strips to his Sunday trousers and coat,—for he meant to have the full complement of stripes; but he managed to accomplish even that, and, if the V's did straggle in a very unsoldierly line up his shoulder, he tried not to see the defect, as he viewed the effect in his bit of a mirror.

Sally, however, was not ignorant of his movements. She resented the fact, too, that they had not been unreservedly laid before her. She had forgotten the frequent humiliations her tongue had inflicted; and, in her offended state, she planned for the utter downfall of the little self-conceit she had left him.

It was the night that she was to carry home the wash for the Kerrs that Jim had arranged for a drill by himself in his impromptu uniform. He knew she would be absent the whole evening to care for the baby, as well. Various society meetings would claim the attention of the boys. There was one thing, though, that Jim did not know,—that Sally took a long detour by Parson's Hall, in order to overtake Jack Barton and Harley Stowe, which resulted in a consultation which grew to include a score of their companions.

By the light of the moon Jim's accoutrements did not look badly. His aunt's carpet-rags were not specially adapted to such ornamentation, and the puckered lengths bore testimony to the work of a novice; but Jim was enjoying himself as well as one lonely boy could under the circumstances. He had not watched the drills for nothing; and he now marched and countermarched under his own commands,—a company in himself. He remembered a previous slur of Sally's to the effect that his running was like a crawfish's,—looked as if he were going backward. So at last he set himself to a double-quick along the pasture fence, when something happened.

"Squad, halt!"

Before he could recover from the astonishment of the sudden command, a circle of boys enclosed him, and Jack Barton faced him.

"I'll take command of this squad," said Jack, briskly.

"Give him a 'setting up.'"

"Put him through the steps."

"Try him on the manual of arms."

The suggestions were simultaneous. Jim knew he was powerless for the time; and he stood still, with heaving breast and flashing eyes.

"Do you know your primer?" demanded Jack.

"Yes, I do," Jim snapped.

"All right, sonny: then fall in. Attention!"

Jim saw the futility of the least show of resistance, and he took a sudden resolve.

"Hanged if the beggar don't work at it pretty well," drawled Harley Stowe, at Jim's prompt, if ridiculous, effort at the execution of commands fitted for a company, to say nothing of a regiment.

Jim's face flushed; but for the next fifteen minutes he was put through a series of evolutions that would have given pointers to a naval academy. He was marched forward and back, in line and to rear, by flank and in column, right, left, wheel, and turn. There was no command too ridiculous for the assembled crowd to give, and none to which Jim did not faithfully endeavor to give some interpretation more or less correct.

"Squad, halt! Whew!" Jack brought his victim to a standstill.

"Haden't you better call for 'port, arms, dismiss'?" queried Harley, with a laugh, as Jack wiped his forehead.

"Yes," said Billy Mills; "for I'd like to call attention to this new style of uniform. What tailor do you patronize, Jim?" Billy carefully pulled out a raveling, to hold it up in the moonlight.

"When did you take out the patent?" "What have I done for you fellows to act this way? I've got a right to wear what I please," flashed out Jim, indignantly. He had suffered himself to be made their butt partly because he knew he could respond to orders as well as the most of them, but he could not stand the jeers at his outfit.

"Why, you've done enough to give you a whole suit of stripes," retorted Billy.

"Stealing from a rag-bag is a penitentiary offence." He gave a quick jerk at an insecurely fastened strip, to leave it dangling from one arm; while Bob Starr served the opposite side likewise the next moment.

"You're big, and there are more of you, I know," Jim blurted out, unable longer to suppress his anger. "You go to Wharton, and I can't; but Lieut. Kerr says himself it takes something more than all that to make a true soldier."

"What is it?" The unexpected defiance roused a noisy clamor. But, before Jim could decide whether further altercation would be best on his part, a sudden glow lighted up the sky,—a glow that was not of the moon's rays. A simultaneous cry broke forth, as all eyes fell upon the nearest hall.

"Fire! Fire!"

Right out from the roof had shot a tongue of flame. Every boy fled in frantic haste. Jim tore off the old gloves as he ran. He remembered that it was Thursday night; and—where was Sally?

An excited throng quickly gathered about the building, the sole entrance to which was filled with smoke. Lieut. Kerr himself answered the question that Jim's heart was thumping out. The lieutenant pushed his way through, and would have entered; but he was held back.

"But my baby,—and the girl Sally,—they're there! Let me go!"

"You can't, lieutenant. We're going to see if we can reach them another way," said a man in front. "Nobody could get up that stairway. There the boys go for a long ladder."

Jim saw the movement, but he did not wait. His mind ran to the time when the new hall was built on the site of an old one. He remembered a gutter running across the front of the mansard roof,—how he and Sally had dared to traverse it more than once. Sally would never let him outdo her. If he could only reach that, he could get to Lieut. Kerr's room. There was an old wistaria vine on the south side. Its strong stem had been trained up the new hall, and he was little. Just then there was a queer feeling of mingled regret and gladness as he thought of it, and it was heightened as he tore off his coat and touched the dangling stripes.

While strong arms were holding the lieutenant from rushing into certain danger, Jim was climbing the wistaria. He remembered another thing as he struggled up. The vine had been wound about the water-pipes, and far up a coil of the stem had been given a firm hold at a transverse joint. It gave him courage, though he knew the flames might reach vine and pipe before he could return. Cinders were falling as he swung himself up on the gutter.

A cry arose from below, where his movements were seen for the first time; and it was answered by another at the middle oriel window, as Sally appeared, with a terrified scream, a bundle in her arms. Like a nimble monkey, Jim traversed the gutter, and jumped in at her side.

"O Jim, you can't do anything for us!" cried Sally. She forgot that he had reached her, at least.

"Tie the baby to me; and you follow, if you can," was all he could find breath to say. "Hurry!"

Sally was always glad he said, "If you can." Just then she had lost her ordinary courage. The situation seemed hopeless, but that was a dare. It appealed to her genuine self. She could and would dare do what Jim did.

Her fingers nervously wound the long scarf-shawl about the child, then around Jim's waist and neck. The baby was small, too; and Jim was thankful for that, and that it was not yet awake. Just as the flames burst into the room behind them, and another cry arose from beneath, he stepped out with a hurried direction to Sally, "Come fast and close, but don't touch me."

Sally obeyed, with a strange feeling that Jim was greater than she. Only cool resolution helped the two, as they darted back along the gutter to the end of the building, Jim scarcely feeling his little load in its improvised hammock. But there a wave of heat met them. Would the wistaria hold to the walls till the descent was made? He heard shouts; but he did not dare look down, nor think of the distance three stories below.

It was growing hotter, and the air seemed full of flame. He must trust to the vine. He did not dare to think of the burden at his back. He only could hope. There was no choice; for Sally was right behind him, saying hoarsely, "Go on, Jim."

"Can you hang to it? Let me get to the next floor, if you can."

"I'm going to," said Sally, setting her lips together.

With the turn in the gutter, he backed over the edge, hanging to pipe and vine. Down he slowly slid. The bundle stirred. His heart stood still. He clung desperately as a swirl of smoke from a window almost took away his breath. A crash somewhere caused him to take a closer grip. There was a cry from above, and a burst of flame. Then he was conscious that Sally, too, had grasped the vine. A tendril broke, and he gasped. Then came a welcome sound:—

"Steady, Jim! Reach for the ladder."

With dry lips, as his feet touched the rungs, he called up: "Hold tight, Sally! The ladder's here."

The next thing he knew he was lying on the ground. Somebody was saying something at a great distance, seemingly.

"'Twas a tug, together with the excitement."

He tried to rise. He asked for his coat. For a few moments it was not altogether clear to him what all the bustle about meant. It came back, as Sally helped him on with it, with a whisper, "They're 'most torn off, but I'll fix them on again."

"Why, it is one of the Wharton boys?"

questioned Lieut. Kerr, coming over to him, and reaching out for his hand.

"It's Jimmy Elkins." Somebody nudged his elbow; and he turned to catch Jack Barton's aside, "Please, lieutenant, don't seem to notice his clothes."

Jim was glad to get home. He knew that the baby and Sally were all right, though the hall was completely gutted; and he knew, too, that he had been the means of saving the two. Lieut. Kerr had told him so, with warm praise; but he did not feel right. It took days before the effect of the strain subsided. The excitement came near developing into a form of heart trouble. He did not want to see any one; but Sally saw to that, and he was not troubled.

As for Sally, he was thankful that she never said anything about the stripes. He did not know the part that she had played in the early evening of the fire, and he hoped that the boys would never tell her that. His ambition seemed such a foolish thing, now that he looked at it all. It was a sham: he realized the fact, and he was sure that the boys had a right to poke fun at him. So the more he thought of it the less he felt like seeing any one. As a consequence, he knew little that was said or done over at Wharton; and Sally was very reticent, for her.

The feeling grew stronger, as he crept out one day to look at a distance upon the parade; for it made him feel smaller than ever to see how tall the boys looked. So he crept back. He went into the back yard, out of sight, behind the hen-house. He heard Sally calling him soon after. It did not take long for her to discover his whereabouts.

"Come on, Jim," she cried, in high ex-

A Good Almanac is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

The Sunlight Almanac for 1896 contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them. Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents. A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 830).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

citement, "and get on your suit for parade!" He did not answer. He had hoped that Sally would never taunt him about those stripes. He had not had on the suit since that night. His aunt, even, had not mentioned them, stained and torn as they were; and they hung in the closet just as they were then left. No one had fixed or unfixed them.

But Sally unceremoniously pulled him to the house, and into it. Harley Stowe and Jack Barton were there, and a big bundle, besides. There was a note, too, which Harley gravely gave him, after saluting him in soldierly fashion. The salute made Jim feel hot.

"Read it, read it!" exclaimed Sally, dancing all around him. "Let me do it." Jim was too slow; and, catching it from him, she read triumphantly:—

"Mr. James Elkins is cordially invited to become a member of the 'Wharton Guards.' His outfit accompanies the invitation."

And there it was. Jack and Harley had it open in a trice,—the soldier blue, the cap and gloves, even belt and sword; but what he saw plainest of all were the stripes on the shoulder,—four of them.

"It's captain, sure," said Jack, laughing at the dazed look. "We told Lieutenant we knew you knew the manual. Get into them, old fellow, and stop staring."

"Jack resigned," said Sally, who could not leave the news untold; "and they elected you to the vacancy."

By this time Jim hardly knew who was talking. He had a confused idea that the process was irregular somewhere, but the boys left him no opportunity for questions. Sally was summarily dismissed to the kitchen, and Jim speedily invested in the new raiment; while his own endeavor to wink fast enough not to let fall some ridiculous drops kept him busy. He was only conscious of one thing, as Sally burst back into the room to exclaim,—

"Soldier clothes make anybody lots taller."

But that was not all. The boys hurried him to the fence. Once on the other side, a sight met his eyes that embarrassed him. A double line of boys was posted from the fence to the band-stand. As he passed between with his escort, the lines saluted, then fell in behind, and marched to where Lieut. Kerr was stationed, awaiting him.

What the lieutenant said he hardly heard; but he knew it was a speech made up of commendation, welcome, and surprise that he had learned so much by looking on. Jim was glad that the officer had the tact to say little about the fire. But there was still something more.

As the boys clustered about him to offer a welcome to their new captain, Jack took his opportunity.

"Jimmy, you and the lieutenant are right. It does take something more than bigness and going to Wharton to make a soldier. It takes bravery. Hurrah for our soldier,—the only one among us that has won his stripes!"

"Didn't they do too big a thing by me?" said Jim to Sally, as he took off his belt that night. She had been silently hovering over him with critical eye. He did wish Sally's approval in this day of gratified desires.

"No," she snapped, bouncing around to face him. "Anyway, 'twa'n't anywhere near as big as what you did." And Jim was fully satisfied.

THE CHAPERONES.

Polly and Molly came out to play one morning, and brought with them their dolls, their garden tools, and their twin kittens. These last were exactly alike, only Molly's wore a red necktie, and Polly's a blue one.

Polly and Molly were very much alike, too; and so were their dolls. They usually played together very happily. But to-day Molly wanted to play party, "with me for a shamprone," she said.

"What is that?" asked Polly, much surprised.

"Well, the minister's wife came to see mamma yesterday; and she said she was shamprone for some girls at a picnic. They kind of look after 'em, I think. Anyway, it must be nice, or the minister's wife wouldn't be it. I'll shamprone Arabella and Rosa, and you can dig in the garden.

"I want to be shamprone for Rosa, my own child, myself," said Polly, decidedly.

"You can't, child," said Molly, firmly and with a superior air. "You don't know how." Polly fired up at this.

"You always want to be the best of everything! And you are as selfish as the lions in Daniel's den," she cried, stamping her foot.

"You are the greatest child to get things twisted," said Molly, laughing, while Polly got very red in the face. "Daniel didn't have a den, poor child."

There is no telling what would have happened next, if Polly's kitten hadn't growled and spit at Molly's, and then the two rushed across the lawn to a hole in the fence. Polly's kitten jumped through this, and Molly's looked through anxiously from the other side, when—slap! came a soft gray paw through the hole, and struck Molly's kitten, who instantly slapped back.

"Well, will you look at Fly!" said Molly.

"And Spy, too," said Polly.

Then they ran and caught them, and sat down on the grass to give them a good lecture.

"Twins fighting! whoever heard of such a thing?" said Molly. "It's perfectly scandalous!"

"I'm as 'shamed as I positively can be," said Polly, rubbing Spy's pink nose against Fly's.

"Kittens are very silly sometimes, I think, don't you, sister?" said Molly, dimpling at Polly.

"Kind of; exactly like girls sometimes," answered Polly, dimpling, too.

Then they looked straight ahead and blushed a little.

"I'll tell you what, let's play we're both shamprones. There's dolls enough and kittens, too, for that matter," said Molly, presently.

"Well, let's," said Polly, cheerfully.

And then they leaned over and kissed each other.

There was a tall woman weeding a flower-bed near by, who had been looking sorry; but now she smiled, and looked glad.—L. E. Chittenden, in the Churchman.

A BIRD'S NEST OF METAL.

In the Museum of Natural History at Soleure, in Switzerland, there is a bird's nest made entirely of steel. There are a number of clock-making shops at Soleure; and in the yards of these shops there are often found lying disused or broken springs of clocks. One day a clock-maker noticed in a tree in his yard a bird's nest of peculiar appearance. Examining it, he found that a pair of wagtails had built a nest entirely of clock springs. It was more than four inches across, and perfectly comfortable for the birds. After the feathered architects had reared their brood, the nest was taken to the Museum, where it is preserved as a striking illustration of the skill of birds in turning their surroundings to advantage in building their nests.

A SUCCESSFUL SCARECROW.

A gardener in Maine was very much annoyed because the crows stole his sweet peas. He tried in many ways to frighten them away, but could not. At last he put a chicken-coop in his garden, and in it a large rooster. The moment the rooster saw the crows he put his head through the bars of the coop, and crowed. The crows flew away at once, greatly frightened, and did not return.

An Opportunity for Young Men.

In thousands of towns in the U. S. there are openings for young men to do an excellent business with a good Magic Lantern. Exhibitions can be arranged for churches, Y. M. C. A.'s, Sunday schools, lodges, and Christian Endeavor and other societies. Many young men pay their way through college by this means. It is an education in itself.

Outfits from $50 upwards, and 100,000 slides to rent on easy terms. Large illustrated catalogue 20 cents. Other literature free. Address

RILEY BROTHERS,
16 Beckman St., New York.
Branches: BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO: 196 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND: 411 Couch St.

Timely Warning.

The great success of the chocolate preparations of the house of Walter Baker & Co. (established in 1780) has led to the placing on the market many misleading and unscrupulous imitations of their name, labels, and wrappers. Walter Baker & Co. are the oldest and largest manufacturers of pure and high-grade Cocoas and Chocolates on this continent. No chemicals are used in their manufactures.

Consumers should ask for, and be sure that they get, the genuine Walter Baker & Co.'s goods.

WALTER BAKER & CO., Limited,
DORCHESTER, MASS.

Charles Scribner's Sons' New Books

LITTLE RIVERS. A Book of Essays in Profitable Idleness. By HENRY VAN DYKE. Profusely illustrated. 12mo, $2.00.
"Dr. Van Dyke has both the heart and the touch of an artist; he feels instinctively the charm of the world of woods and waters; he has a loving companionship with all sound human living, and he has the magic of style."—HAMILTON W. MABIE.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF NAPOLEON, his Family and his Court. Memoirs of Constant, first Valet de Chambre of the Emperor. Translated from the French. With an Introduction by IMBERT DE SAINT-AMAND. 4 vols., 12mo, $5.00.

THE ART OF LIVING. By ROBERT GRANT. With 135 illustrations by C. D. Gibson, B. W. Clinedinst, and W. H. Hyde. 12mo, $2.50.
"He deals with the practical problems in the every-day life of the every-day man with his own characteristic wit and fancy."—Boston Advertiser.

THE BACHELOR'S CHRISTMAS, and Other Stories. By ROBERT GRANT. With 21 full-page illustrations by C. D. Gibson, Irving R. Wiles, A. B. Wenzell, and C. Carleton. 12mo, $1.50.
"It contains some of the very brightest stories by this very bright author. A thoroughly fascinating and delightful book."—Philadelphia Press.

UNC' EDINBURG. A Plantation Echo. By THOMAS NELSON PAGE. Illustrated by B. W. Clinedinst. Small folio, $1.50. Uniform with the handsome illustrated editions of "Marse Chan," "Meh Lady," and "Polly."

CONSTANTINOPLE. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Fully illustrated by Edwin Lord Weeks. Square 12mo, $1.50.
"It gives a charming description of Turkish life, and depicts sights and scenes in the Sultan's capital."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

WOMEN OF COLONIAL AND REVOLUTIONARY TIMES. A Series designed to portray the lives and the times of the eminent women of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods. The first volume, now ready, is on Margaret Winthrop, and written by Mrs. ALICE MORSE EARLE. 12mo, $1.25.

ENGLISH LANDS, LETTERS, AND KINGS. Queen Anne and the Georges. By DONALD G. MITCHELL. 12mo, $1.50. Continuing the former volumes, "From Celt to Tudor" and "From Elizabeth to Anne."

REFLECTIONS AND COMMENTS, 1865-1895. By E. L. GODKIN, Editor of the New York Evening Post. 8vo, $2.00.
A volume of essays selected by the author from the mass of his work during thirty years of editorial experience.

COLLEGE GIRLS. By ABBE CARTER GOODLOE. Illustrated by C. D. Gibson. 12mo, $1.25.
"The stories are all excellent in quality, and some of them are exceedingly bright."—Boston Advertiser.

MISS JERRY. By ALEXANDER BLACK. A novel and original love-story, illustrated from photographs from life. 16mo, $1.00.

COUSIN ANTHONY AND I. Some Views of Ours about Divers Matters and Various Aspects of Life. Uniform with "Windfalls of Observation." By EDWARD S. MARTIN. 12mo, $1.25.

CRUISING AMONG THE CARIBBEES. Summer Days in Winter Months. By CHARLES A. STODDARD, D.D., Editor of the New York Observer. Illustrated. 12mo, $1.50.

CAMEO EDITION. New volumes in this dainty series are: "A Chosen Few," selected short stories, by FRANK R. STOCKTON; "A Little Book of Profitable Tales," by EUGENE FIELD; "Reflections of a Married Man" and "The Opinions of a Philosopher," by ROBERT GRANT. Each volume, with etched frontispiece, 16mo, $1.25.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, 153-157 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.
If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY
FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

For the Christian Register.

THE LORD'S PRAYER IN VAN.

BY ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

[From the Armenian of Raphael Patkanian.]

Our heavenly Father, hallowed be thy name,
Restore to us our kingdom here on earth.
Thy will be done in all things, but let not Armenia groan beneath the Turkish yoke.
We ask not now for bread, or soft or hard:
Only give weapons to us every one.
We do not pray to-day, "Forgive our debts":
Only take off the taxes of the Turk.
Lead us into temptation, even of war,
So thy Armenia may again be free!

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.

The fourteenth regular meeting of the New England Associate Alliance, and its first meeting for this season, was held in the First Church, Eliot Square, Roxbury, on Wednesday, November 13. Mr. De Normandie, in welcoming the ladies, spoke of the early associations of the church, and also of some of the Revolutionary memories connected with the neighborhood. The church was gathered in 1631, the present building erected in 1804. When Dean Stanley came to this country, he most cared to visit the spot where the Pilgrims landed and the church where John Eliot preached. After brief devotional exercises, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, the presiding officer, introduced Miss Sarah L. Arnold, supervisor of the Boston public schools. Her subject had been given as "Moral Training," which she had been asked to treat, she said, in its broader aspects, not merely from the point most familiar to her,—that of teacher and pupil. The general principles are, however, the same, whether applied by parents or teachers. We must teach the children to know and love the right, and then make them strong to do it. How shall this be done? First present the pattern unflinchingly. As in language, even in gesture, the child copies its elders and takes the form of its surroundings, so will it receive the stamp of character. Abstract theories of right will be of little use if the child sees them contradicted in practice. They will do what they see their elders do, not merely what they hear their elders tell them to do. Children are keen and somewhat stern critics. All that we do, all that we are, comes out in them by inheritance and by imitation. We owe it to them to try to be and to do all that we require from them, but our own shortcomings are no reason for too ready excuses for them. We should demand from them not only prompt obedience to orders, but that steady, long-continued, daily, and hourly conformity to the laws of living, that regard for the convenience and comfort of others on which true family life is built, and which is the best preparation for their future life and work in the world. We cannot indulge them, from a foolish affection, in selfishness for five days, and expect them to be spontaneously unselfish when some sudden demand comes upon them to which we think they ought to respond. The ideals presented must hold no such element of caprice. If you let them pass years in idleness and thoughtlessness, can you expect them to be self-denying and industrious when the work of life calls upon them? Accustom the child to the steady habit of right-doing, so that he will work with the laws of life, and find them wings, not bonds.

Miss Arnold was followed by Mr. Stone, the new treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, whose subject was "Woman's Work in Denominational Affairs." Mr. Stone presented a plan—he himself would say "suggestions"—for a broader work, which might, he thought, be the outcome of our Post-office Mission. Something of this work has already been done by the National Alliance. Mr. Stone has kindly consented that this paper should be printed in full, and no attempt will be made to give an account of it here. The discussion which followed this paper showed the interest it had excited; and it is to be hoped that, when it appears, we shall hear comments upon it, not only from the Alliance, but from the denomination at large.

Mrs. H. B. Goodwin spoke of a very interesting letter she had just seen, written in 1837 by Dr. Ephraim Peabody to Dr. Putnam. In this he outlined a plan for sending our preachers into the Western field, which then seemed so much more remote than now.

Miss Channing, who is always listened to with affection as well as interest, spoke on the theme she has so much at heart,—“The Religious Education of the Young.”

Mrs. Richardson of Lowell gave an account of the work of the Lowell Branch. Mrs. Richardson is president of this Branch, and also one of the directors of the National Board. The Branch is one of the earliest formed, and her account of their methods proved most interesting. One lady said she had found this the most helpful meeting for practical Alliance work which she had ever attended.

Rev. Pitt Dillingham gave an account of his Southern work. This mission among the freedmen may be considered as appealing to us to-day as the work for the Indians did to the apostle Eliot. The Executive Board of the National Alliance was directed to recommend this work to all the Branches.

Time forbade more than a word about Atlanta from Mrs. Fifiield. The roll-call showed forty-eight of the Massachusetts Branches represented and one from Vermont. We usually have more members from distant Branches, but many of these ladies have too lately returned from Washington to undertake another journey so soon.

The report of the Nominating Committee appointed at Lawrence was then read. This report had been printed, and sent to the secretary of each Branch. This report was accepted by the delegates present, and the following officers declared elected (fourteen Branches sent their vote by mail): president, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, Boston, Mass.; vice-presidents, Mrs. E. C. Jordan, Portland, Me., Mrs. H. B. Goodwin, Cambridge, Mass.; secretary and treasurer, Mrs. G. S. Hale, Boston, Mass. Directors: Mrs. E. M. F. Bartlett, Waterville, Me.; Mrs. Mary C. Warder, Brattleboro, Vt.; Miss Mary A. Downing, Concord, N.H.; Miss Phoebe M. Waldo, Salem, Mass.; Mrs. Mary E. Cleveland, Providence, R.I.; Mrs. John C. Kimball, Hartford, Conn.; Miss Mary L. Hall, Dorchester, Mass.; Mrs. Sarah Theo Brown, Worcester, Mass.; Miss Laura Dewey Russell, Plymouth, Mass.

Miss Mary L. Hall moved that Article VII. of our by-laws be amended by the insertion of the words “and speakers” after the word “officers.” The by-law would then read: “Branches which feel able to do so are asked to contribute yearly to the New England Associate Alliance from $1 to $2 to defray expenses of postage, printing, and the travelling expenses of those officers and speakers whose presence may be requested at any meeting. Such contributions shall be sent to the secretary.” No officer has so far asked or accepted payment for travelling expenses; but experience has shown that it is always courteous and desirable and sometimes necessary to pay the expenses of speakers, especially when they come from a distance. There has been no authority to do this with any of the money contributed, but this vote enables the Branch to pay them when in their opinion expedient. Since the by-law was passed, January, 1893, $34 has been contributed by eighteen Branches. This has been ample for postage, stationery, and printing,—the only uses to which it has so far been applied; and there is now a balance on hand of $15.04, with one unpaid bill. But this vote will make the contribution of more money desirable from those Branches who feel interested in the object.

Mrs. Goodwin offered a vote of thanks to the Roxbury ladies, by whom we had been so agreeably and hospitably received; and the thanks of the meeting were also given to Miss Arnold for her address. The meeting then adjourned to the vestry for lunch and social intercourse.

ELLEN S. HALE, Sec'y.

Boston, Lowell, and Woburn each reports a Greek Christian Endeavor Society.

Joel Goldthwait & Co.

Have just received and opened a few bales of VERY CHOICE

Oriental Rugs

RARE COLORINGS AND DESIGNS.

Just the thing for Wedding or Holiday Presents.

We have put them in stock at

LOW PRICES,

to meet the present competition.

163 to 169 Washington Street.

NEAR CORNHILL.

ORGANIST.

A Harvard man, experienced, is open to engagement as organist. Address E. M. J., Box 348, Boston Post-office.

GLENWOOD RANGES AND HEATERS

MAKE HOUSEKEEPING EASY.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

Stylish Jackets, Capes, and Furs.

Ladies desiring a just equivalent for their money, and Outside Garments of the very latest style and finish, should call at

Springer Brothers,

and examine their New Jackets. Handsome, Genteel, and as satisfactory in price as can be found in Boston. Central Location. Well-lighted salesrooms and courteous attendants.

500 Washington St., corner Bedford St., Boston.

Just Published

A CATECHISM OF LIBERAL FAITH

By Rev. Charles F. Dole

The following extracts from the Preface show the character of this new manual: "The purpose of this Catechism is to further a thoughtful understanding of the good life. The wish here is to show that man belongs to an unseen universe; that this universe is divine and beneficent; that a certain distinct and noble type of thought, feeling, and conduct is in accord with such a universe; and that the highest and largest life grows out of the realization of these facts."

The book contains 34 chapters. Pages 112. In cloth, 35 cents a copy; per dozen, $3.50. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; per dozen, $1.80.

Revised Edition

UNITARIAN CATECHISM

By Rev. Minot J. Savage

We also have for sale Mr. Savage's Catechism (published by George H. Ellis), which has been used in our Sunday-schools for some time with great favor. The author says in his Preface: "This little Catechism has grown out of the needs of my own work. It is an attempt to help teachers and parents by putting in their hands in brief compass the principal things believed by Unitarians concerning the greatest subjects. This is an effort to make the path of ascertained truth a little plainer."

Pages 67. In cloth, 30 cents a copy; per dozen, $2.50. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; per dozen, $1.50.

Send orders to the

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.
2. The Beseeching God.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR NOVEMBER.

Unpardonable Sin." Rev. J. E. Roberts.
Savonarola: A Sketch. H. S. Fletcher Williams.
The Voice of Warning. James Rowe.
The Roman Catholic Church. Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D.
At the Morning. Maud L. Cotton.
The Glorious Gospel.
Demands of the Age.
Sunday School Association.
Remembrance. H. C. Tenney.
The English Congregationalists. J. T. Sunderland.
A Lesson from Tolstoi. George S. Cottman.
Talk with Boys. Jessie Whitsitt.
A Service of Welcome to the Church. Rev. Albert Walkley.
Correspondence. Rev. Margaret T. Olmstead.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Emily A. Fifiield; Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Eliot; Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.
3. Reaping Time.
4. Called to be Saints.
5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)
6. The Religious Situation.
7. The Forward Movement of Unitarianism. (By Rev. George Batchelor.)
8. Our Divine Partnership.
9. Dr. Gordon's Book, "The Christ of To-day."

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
41 Franklin Street, Boston.

THANKSGIVING.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

The constant goodness and forbearance of Almighty God which has been vouchsafed to the American people during the year which is just past call for sincere acknowledgment and devout gratitude.

To the end, therefore, that we may with thankful hearts unite in extolling the loving care of our heavenly Father, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby appoint and set apart Thursday, the twenty-eighth day of the present month of November, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to be kept and observed by all our people.

On that day let us forego our usual occupations, and in our accustomed places of worship join in rendering thanks to the Giver of every good and perfect gift for the bounteous returns that have rewarded our labors in the fields and in the busy marts of trade, for the peace and order that have prevailed throughout the land, for our protection from pestilence and dire calamity, and for the blessings that have been showered upon us from an open hand.

And, with our thanksgiving, let us humbly beseech the Lord to incline the hearts of our people unto him, that he will not leave us nor forsake us as a nation, but will continue to us his mercy and protecting care, guiding us in the path of national prosperity and happiness, imbuing us with rectitude and virtue, and keeping alive within us a patriotic love for the free institutions which have been given to us as our national heritage.

And let us, also, on the day of our thanksgiving especially remember the poor and needy, and by deeds of charity let us show the sincerity of our gratitude.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

(Signed) GROVER CLEVELAND.

Done at the city of Washington this fourth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, and in the one hundredth and twentieth year of the independence of the United States.

By the President:

RICHARD OLNEY, Secretary of State.

JOHN S. WEST.

Few laymen in the Unitarian denomination have been more intimately connected with its history or more devotedly attached to its interests than John S. West of Tiverton, R.I., who died a few days ago, after a short illness of paralysis. For three generations the influence of his family has been felt in the promotion of liberal Christianity in South-eastern New England. His grandfather, Samuel West, D.D., for forty-two years pastor of the old church in Dartmouth, still existent under the name "The First Church of New Bedford," was the pioneer of Unitarianism in that section, and one of its most prominent divines. He was the one to meet Jonathan Edwards in a metaphysical tilt on the subject of "Liberty and Necessity." Rev. William J. Potter, in his history of the New Bedford church, has written a just and most interesting account of Dr. West and his influence in bringing his wide parish over to the side of Unitarianism.

The only son of the clergyman was Samuel West, the leading physician of Eastern Rhode Island half a century ago. So deeply implanted in him was his sympathy with his father's religious views that he became one of Dr. Channing's strong supporters, and one of the most active promoters of the movement to establish a Unitarian church in Fall River. For many years the family, though resident nine miles away, were regular attendants upon its services. In connection with Dr. Channing's little church near Newport, Mr. West was fond of telling the story of his childish experience. Dr. Channing was in feeble health, and could not preach regularly. The drive from the Tiverton home to the island church was too long to take on uncertainties, so an arrangement was made with a friend living near the little church to raise a certain signal on Sunday morning if Dr. Channing was to preach. Regularly, at the appointed hour, the old Negro servant of the West family climbed to the attic window with the spy-glass. If the signal was out across the bay, the chaise was harnessed, and father, mother, and child drove the nine miles to service.

Upon the son of this family fell the mantle of his fathers; and for years John West has been one of the most active workers of the denomination, both as chief guardian of the interests of Bowen Memorial Chapel in Tiverton, and as a sharer in the general work of the cause, a regular attendant upon its assemblies, and an ardent reader of its literature. One fact of itself will show something of the intimate connection of the family with the Unitarian church. Recently, in a fit of reminiscence, Mr. West began to count up his acquaintance with Unitarian ministers, counting only those who had been guests at his table. The list numbered fifty-six, and that, too, though the table was in a remote country district, quite out of the beaten path of ministerial travel.

With a strong, impressive face and commanding form, Mr. West was a noticeable figure in any gathering; and he will be missed by many who never knew either his noble, winning nature or the rare charm of his endless fund of reminiscence,—the accumulation of threescore years of wide experience and marvellous memory.

Mr. West's death has made a vacancy that will never be filled, not only in the church of his love, but in the town of which he was one of the most honored citizens, and in a circle of friends wide as few men in private life can claim.

Personals.

Mrs. Margaret S. Bruce, whose death was announced in last week's Register, was one of the faithful workers in the Winchester church during its early years. The firmness, gentleness, and broad-mindedness which characterized her life knew no change even in the physical suffering of the last months. Her death has taken away another of the older Unitarian residents.

Charities and Reforms.

The thirteenth annual bazaar for the benefit of the Home for Aged Couples opened at Horticultural Hall Monday, November 18, and continues one week. Friends are asked to contribute useful or fancy articles or provisions for the dinner that will be served daily. The home needs many and large donations to meet the expenses of the present year, increased as they are by the new building.

The English Society for the Protection of Birds is again agitating for the abolition of plumes and aigrettes in ladies' headgear. "When one thinks," writes a member, "of the agony inflicted on the parent birds by the plume hunters, who, in their haste, often tear off the wings, and fling away the mutilated bodies to rot in heaps, while the fledglings are left to starve slowly in the nests, one wonders how ornaments procured at such a cost can give pleasure to the wearers."

Education.

A course of eight lectures by Mr. John Graham Brooks will be given at the Prospect Union, 744 Massachusetts Avenue, Cambridgeport, once a month, from November to June, beginning November 21. This is the same course that he is giving before the Discussion Club of Brookline, and also in Buckingham Hall, Cambridge. The subjects of the lectures are as follows: "What the Social Question means," "The Modern Industrial Struggle for Existence," "Socialism up to Date: Its Strength and Weakness," "The New Socialism in the Catholic and Protestant Churches," "Luxury as an Individual and Social Problem," "The Socialistic and Literary Attack on the Monogamic Family," "Woman's Relations to Certain Social Evils," "Some Fundamental Truths which concern us All." A list of books is suggested which members of the class may profitably read in preparation. Circulars or tickets may be had from Miss M. L. Drew, 19 Jay Street, or the Prospect Union, Cambridgeport, or from the Women's Educational and Industrial Union, or Denison House, Boston.

THE DELICATE DECORATIONS of fine silverware are destroyed by poor silver polish. Don't risk them, USE

ELECTRO-SILICON

The standard silver-polish, a perfect polisher, which saves silverware and gives it brilliancy without wearing, without scratching. Sold everywhere. Used everywhere. Sent postpaid, 15c.

The ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

DIE

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None Such Mince Meat. For sale by all Grocers. Be sure you get the None Such—avoid imitations.

MERRELL-SOULE CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

Popular Works.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."

Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages.

"One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages.

"There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages.

"One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful."—Philadelphia To-day.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents.

Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

 For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,

174 High Street, - - - Boston.

Just Published.

The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics.

BY

THOMAS HILL, D.D., LL.D.

Contents:

PART I., POSTULATES OF REVELATION.—I. The Unseen Real; II. The Reality of Knowledge; III. The Infinite Knowable; IV. Final Causes; V. The Universe a Work of Art; VI. Power and Possibility; VII. Logic and Love; VIII. Beauty; IX. The Testimony of Conscience; X. The Infinite in Man; XI. Relativity and Reality; XII. The Universe a Revelation; XIII. Authority and Inspiration; XIV. Summary of Natural Sources of Religious Knowledge.

PART II., POSTULATES OF ETHICS.—I. The Field of Ethics; II. The Validity of Moral Perceptions; III. The Nature of Ethical Relations; IV. The Innocence and Sinfulness of Error; V. Love and Duty; VI. Determinism and Utility; VII. Duties Relative to Self; VIII. The Connection of Ethics with Religion; IX. Non-religious Morals and Moralists; X. Learning by Doing.

394 pages, with portrait, price $1.50.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrance. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William G. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William B. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY: THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.

141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.
20. PRIMITIVE MAN: Pliocene, paleolithic and neolithic races; the ages of bronze and iron, cave-men and lake-dwellers; mound builders; primitive tools. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANILAND WAKE.
22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.
23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHERDON.
24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Supernatural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

"HE THAT WORKS EASILY, WORKS SUCCESSFULLY." CLEAN HOUSE WITH

SAPOLIO

Pleasantries.

What a lot of labor would be saved if the sweeping glances we read about would only take the dirt from carpets!—Buffalo Courier.

Friend: "Did you meet with much hospitality in India?" Tommy Atkins: "Yes, I was in hospital nearly all the time."—Investigator.

Dolly, after surveying her last summer's hat, critically remarked, "Mamma, the hat is nice enough, but the ribbons look rather withered."—Youth's Companion.

Editor: "John, take that cat away: I cannot write with the row it is making. Where is it?" John: "Why, sir, you are sitting on it."—Sacred Heart Review.

Pedler: "That little book on 'How to preserve the Hair' is the key to the entire situation." Baldhead: "I am very sorry, but I haven't a single lock that it would fit."—Sacred Heart Review.

"Have they named your baby brother yet, Adams?" "Yeth, thir. They've called him Georgy, after Uncle George; and I don't like it a bit. I wanted him named Adamth, after me."—Harper's Young People.

The Philadelphia Record has a new and undeserved slur at Chicago: "Gimme a piece of apple-pie, quick," said a customer at a railway restaurant. "Chicago or Boston?" asked the waiter. "What do you mean?" "Knife or fork?"

A doctor waiting for his dinner grew impatient at the delay in serving, which was noticed by a lady near by, who remarked to her friend that the doctor had no patience to-day. He remarked that it was enough to provoke any doctor not to have any patients. Ram's Horn.

A lecturer gave utterance to the following: "All along the untrodden paths of the future we can see the hidden footprints of an unseen Hand." At another time he exclaimed, "We pursue the shadow, the bubble bursts, and leaves the ashes in our hands."—Christian Work.

Little Mary went to church; and, when her pastor called next day, wishing to be social, she said to him, "I heard you speak your piece yesterday." "Did you?" he said, surprised and amused. "How did you like it?" "Oh," was the honest but unexpected reply, "it made me awfully sleepy."—Youth's Companion.

A good mother was hearing her little child repeat the Lord's Prayer the other night. As the child hesitated a bit over the expression, "Forgive us our trespasses," she interrupted long enough to ask, "Do you understand, dear, what 'trespass' means?" "Oh, yes," replied the little one: "it means 'keep off the grass!'"

Relationships are very confusing to the juvenile mind, but there are not many children so delightfully at sea as the small girl of the following story: She appeared with a small brother at a public school, and gave in their names as "Ralph and Edith Johnson." "Brother and sister, I suppose?" said the teacher. "Oh, no, ma'am," said the little girl, "we're twins!"—Youth's Companion.

A disappointed fish-hawker was belaboring his slow but patient horse in the street one day, and calling out his wares at intervals, as: "Herrin! Herrin! Fresh herrin!" A tender-hearted lady, seeing the act of cruelty to the horse, called out sternly from an upper window, "Have you no mercy?" "No, mum," was the reply: "nothin' but herrin'."—New York Clipper.

In the early days when Mrs. Julia Ward Howe was becoming known as a public speaker, she met with some opposition both among her friends and the people generally. Walking down Charles Street one day with a friend, Mrs. Howe noticed the sign over the Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary, and read it over slowly: "Charitable Eye and Ear— Can it be that there is a charitable ear in Boston?"—Youth's Companion.

A CURIOUS OLD BILL.

Here is a scrap actually taken from the old church records of a church in Winchester, England:—

"Winchester, October, 1182.
"For work done by Peter M. Sollers,
In soldering and repairing St. Joseph,	s. d.
Cleaning and ornamenting the Holy Ghost,	0 8
Repairing the Virgin Mary behind and before, and making a new child,	0 6
Screwing a nose on the devil, and placing a new joint in his tail,	4 8
	6 6
	12 4
"Paid December, 1182.
"P. M. Sollers,
"Church Mechanic."

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Henry F. Miller

Piano-fortes.

Henry F. Miller & Sons Piano Co.

88 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE, New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

THE BEST SILVERWARE

in quality and finish.

New and desirable patterns many of which cannot be found elsewhere.

Bigelow, Kennard & Co.

50 Washington St. cor. West.

EMBROIDERY SILK HALF PRICE

Factory ends or waste embroidery silk at half price. Ounce package (assorted colors) sent post-paid for 40 cts. (One-half oz. package, 25 cts.) All good silk and good colors. 100 crazy stitches in each package. With an order for 5 oz. we give one extra ounce FREE.

Brainard & Armstrong Silk Co., 2 Union Street, New London, Conn.

XMAS DIALOGUES. Pieces to speak and how to get up fascinating Sunday School Entertainment—all 10c.

J. & P. B. MYERS, 85 John St., N. Y.

A PHYSICIAN'S WIDOW, who has travelled extensively abroad, will conduct a small party through Spain, Southern France, Italy, and Egypt, leaving New York by S.S. "Kaiser Wilhelm," Jan. 22, 1896. References exchanged. Address Mrs. Dr. RANDOLPH, 179 Herkimer Street, Brooklyn, N.Y.

THAT = DINING TABLE

Look over your knives, forks, spoons. Don't embarrass your family or your guests with a lack of Table Utensils. Silver Tea Sets, Nut Picks, Fruit Knives, Ladles, and Bonbon Dishes, Wine Glasses, Finger Bowls, Celery Trays, Salad Bowls, Knife Rests, Toast Racks, plates specially appropriate for each course,—all these are seasonable

Thanksgiving Suggestions

We've had a great sale on Game, Fish, and Meat Sets; but there are still some of those Liquidation Sale Bargains left.

ABRAM FRENCH COMPANY, CROCKERY, CHINA, GLASS AND SILVERWARE, 89, 91, 93 Franklin St., BOSTON.

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

EBBITT HOUSE,

WASHINGTON, D.C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Popular Prices. Regular rate $4.00 per day up. Fifty rooms on the sixth floor, with steam heat and electric light, reduced to $2.50 and 3.00 per day. Fifty rooms on other floors reduced from $4.00 to $3.50 per day. Parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates. Special rates for the Army and Navy Officers and the Clergy.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin

BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

The Great LIGHT

Frank's Patent Reflectors for Gas, Oil, or Electric, give the most powerful, softest, cheapest, and best light known for Churches, Stores, Banks, Theatres, Depots, etc. New and elegant designs. Send size of room. Get circular & estimate. A liberal discount to churches & the trade. Don't be deceived by cheap imitations.

I. P. FRANK, 551 Pearl St., N.Y.

New York, N.Y., 11 West 86th St. (adj. Central Park). A THE JACOTOT SCHOOL. Boarding & Day School for Girls. Mile. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Fall term begins Oct. 1. Kindergarten begins Oct. 15.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS. SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71

LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94

$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.

ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.

S. F. TRULL, Secretary.

WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

GEO. H. ELLIS,

Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

- BOOKS
- PAMPHLETS
- NEWSPAPERS
- MAGAZINES
- SERMONS
- CATALOGUES
- REPORTS
- LAW WORK

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. JOHN H. PRAY, Sons & Co., CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY, 658 WASHINGTON ST., OPP. BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1895.

NUMBER 48.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Blessings to Come; Is Life Worth Living?	781
The Doctrine of the Remnant; Light at Evening Time; Levity in Dress,	782
MUSINGS,	783
BREVITIES,	783
PRO AND CON.
Wanted; King's Chapel Noon Services; Humane Leaflets,	783
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
All Souls', by Alice Brown,	783
Florence in Autumn, by Augusta Larned; Russian Literature, by Sophie Friedland,	784
Thomas Treadwell Stone, D.D.; Augustus Woodbury, D.D.,	785
The "New World"; American Unitarian Association,	786
New York Letter,	794
Mrs. Stephen H. Bullard,	795
CONFERENCES.
The Middle States and Canada,	785
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	787
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	787
SERMON GLEANINGS.
The Harvest, by W. C. Gannett; Thanksgiving, by Charles G. Ames,	788
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	788
LITERATURE.
"The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics,"	788
Other Book Notices,	789
Literary Notes; Magazines; Books Received,	791
THE HOME.
Jack Merrill's Thanksgiving, by Lyman Hamlin, Grandma's Drawer; Good for the Mayor; About the Rainbow,	792
POETRY.
148th Psalm, by John Codman,	783
"Vexilla Regis Prodeunt," by Rev. Edward Randall Knowles; My Citadel, by Esther B. Tiffany,	788
In the Border-land, by Mabelle P. Clapp,	792
The Stars,	794
HERE AND THERE,	794
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	795
PERSONALS,	795
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	795
EDUCATION,	795
TEMPERANCE,	795
PLEASANTRIES,	796

SPECIMEN COPIES of the Christian Register will be sent free for four weeks to any one wishing to examine it. Application should be made with address in full to

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Editorial.

WITHIN the last week two Unitarian ministers have passed into the beyond. One was Rev. Augustus Woodbury, widely known among Unitarians, and who, after his long pastorate at Providence, had withdrawn from the active work of the ministry. In another column his services and character are fittingly recognized. The other was Rev. Charles W. Park of Pittsfield, Mass. He had served an honorable term of years in the ministry of the orthodox Congregational Church in India and in this country. In scholarship and in intellectual power he did credit to the family name rendered famous by his uncle, Prof. Park of Andover. Within a few months he had identified himself with the Unitarian fellowship, and had just entered upon its ministry at Pittsfield, when he rapidly succumbed to an attack of bronchial consumption. His death is a severe disappointment to the society at Pittsfield and to the many friends who had expected new abundant fruits from his ministry.

WHEN Episcopacy was established in this country, it felt, as we have before shown, the influence of Congregationalism. This resulted in giving the congregations the right to choose their own ministers. In England appointments are made through the bishop or through a patron who dispenses the living. In England the question of giving congregations more power or influence in the choice of pastors shows the dissatisfaction which exists with the present system, and a tendency toward the Congregational habit. In this country, on the other hand, there are some tendencies in the other direction; and they are recorded in the last number of the Churchman. There are many unoccupied parishes and unoccupied clergymen; and in Pennsylvania it is proposed to give the bishop the power of appointment such as exists in the Methodist Episcopal Church. But it is doubtful whether Episcopal congregations in this country will be willing to surrender the right they have so long enjoyed of selecting their own ministers.

THE Christian Intelligencer reads with regret the statements of some newspapers that the churches do not believe that the heathen are doomed because it finds some truth in these declarations: "There is a lack of backbone and courage in some pulpits which is exceedingly injurious." Yet it has never required much backbone to stand up in the pulpit and damn the heathen. It has required more courage to proclaim the possibility of their salvation, and many have been marked as heretics who have done this; but even the Intelligencer shows the influence of the new missionary motive. "The heathen," it says, "are manifestly unfit for heaven. If heaven is a happy place, it is a holy place. Happiness without holiness is impossible. The heathen are not holy, and are condemned by their own moral codes, as every man is. What is to make them holy and fit for heaven?" Of course, the answer, though the Intelligencer does not give it, is naturally moral and spiritual education; and this can be applied without relighting the smouldering bonfires of the old hell.

ANOTHER Spiritualistic charlatan has just been exposed in New York. Séances were held by this "doctor," and materialistic frauds were enacted night after night. When the detectives exposed the fraud at a séance, they were attacked by men armed and retained for the purpose, and only succeeded in conquering the rogues after a hard fight. It was, indeed, a reproduction of the Albro case, which excited much attention last winter in Boston. Mr. Hodgson of the Psychical Society has likewise just returned from England after having exposed there another Spiritualistic magician who had had a large following. We confess that we have but small sympathy with the people who allow themselves to be deceived night after night by such manifestations. If proof of life after death must depend upon such stuff as is uttered and such scenes as are enacted at many of these séances, the question whether life is now worth living may be changed to whether it is worth living hereafter.

THE authority of Jesus has so often been rested by his disciples upon his power to heal physical ills that it is not surprising that modern messiahs should acquire influence by their possession of personal magnetism. Father Schlatter, the so-called "Messiah" in the West, has secured a large following by his healing power. This is not a wholly rare phenomenon. Undoubtedly, the science of medicine has paid a little too much attention to the compounding of drugs and herbs, and too little attention to those healing forces which may reside in personality. Possibly, the time may come when it will be considered an essential qualification for every physician who graduates from a medical school to have some of that healing power which, for want of a better name, we now call magnetism. There are so many well-attested facts concerning the possession of this power, and regular practitioners so often owe their success to their personal influence rather than to the medicines they carry with them, that it would seem the next step for medical science to take would be to study the operation of these mysterious forces. The doctor would then become more and more, not merely the purveyor of medicines, but a medicine-man, in whom health is more contagious than disease.

THE Independent thinks that "a more beautiful sight was never seen than the celebration of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton's eightieth birthday by three thousand women, who gathered last week at the Metropolitan Opera House to do her honor. These women represented the various associated organizations of women for literary, benevolent, and missionary purposes; and they did honor to a woman who has been foremost in a womanly crusade for the removal of every political or social disability under which women suffer." The Independent is not quite willing, however, to accept the demand of Mrs. Stanton "that all unworthy reflections on the sacred character of the mother of the race, such as the allegory of her creation and fall, and Paul's assumptions as to her social status, be expunged from our church literature. Such sentiments cannot inspire the rising generations with respect for their mothers." We agree with our contemporary. We see no reason why these archaic stories and precepts should be expunged from the Bible. The story of Eve is mythological, and as mythology it has no more authority than other fables. There are things in Paul's letters that were written for his age, and do not belong to ours; and all that is necessary is to distinguish between the transient and the permanent. We suspect that no one would be more surprised or disappointed than Paul to learn that his local letters had attained a universal and immortal character, and that passages were used to block the wheels of progress instead of accelerating them. What Mrs. Stanton should ask for is not an expurgated Bible, but a more intelligent interpretation of the one we have.

THE movement in Boston to establish an association whose object it shall be to secure the presentation of standard plays by a standard company of actors will undoubtedly meet with opposition from more than one direction. Those pious people who are totally opposed to the theatre, who think it something essentially bad, will not support it; and the thousands of people who prefer poor art to good will smile at the Herculean task which the new association has undertaken. But, whatever may be the final outcome of this endeavor, there cannot be the slightest doubt that dramatic art is in a lamentable condition in this country and in England, and that something is needed for its elevation. Of this fact none are more conscious than the great actors of the day, as well as the more intellectual patrons of the theatre. Letters from Joseph Jefferson and Sir Henry Irving in support of this enterprise are sufficient proof that it is not an impracticable or undesirable scheme. This association, however, has not launched upon the large work of dramatic reform. Its members simply say at present that they propose to have something better themselves than is now generally provided for them, and will take steps in that direction by hiring a theatre and securing good plays and good actors. By and by may we not look for an endowed theatre, as we have endowed colleges and schools and museums and music conservatories? Such is the suggestion of Sir Henry Irving. The fact that Mr. Henry A. Clapp, Rev. Leighton Parks, Mrs. Erving Winslow, and Mr. Joseph Jefferson are aiding and guiding this enterprise is one indication that it is moving in the right direction, and under the best artistic and moral influence.

BLESSINGS TO COME.

The Thanksgiving account is not to be made up simply by a ledger account of blessings received. That is indeed a natural and reciprocal expression of gratitude, especially in human relations. We are thankful to those who have helped us in the past: we cannot be sure of their gifts in the future. They may become impoverished, or we may be removed from the circle of their beneficence. But in our relations to God it is different. We can never pass beyond the circle of his beneficence, and we may have perfect confidence that his blessings and mercies to us will never cease. This is in itself an inspiration to gratitude. Our Thanksgiving Day does not depend alone upon the number of bushels of corn or wheat that have been garnered. These furnish indeed a part of the basis of our physical existence, and the divine bounty is signified in them as in the air and the light. But, when we seek a final basis for our gratitude, we shall find it not in exports or imports, but in those spiritual elements which give life its deepest and richest reality and register within us the prophecy of a life beyond.

Thus, when we view the occasions for gratitude in our life, we shall find one of them in the promise we have of blessings to come, of life that is to unfold into larger experience, and which is so adjusted to temporal events that even its failures, sorrows, and deprivations may yet enrich it.

IS LIFE WORTH LIVING?

To raise the question at all on Thanksgiving Day is to cast a shadow over the President's proclamation. Yet there are always some to raise it. Those broken down in body or in mind, or followed by disaster, may or may not ask it. For those who suffer most in body or in fortune often cling to life most tenaciously, and find some sweetness even in its bitterness. If the testimony on this question were to be taken from the hospitals, where men are suffering physical distress, or from the slums, where they suffer the evils of poverty, we doubt altogether whether the answer, taking life not in patches of hours and minutes, but in all its dimensions, would be that life is not worth living. The spirit of contentment is by no means so rare as it seems; and the amount of sanctifying patience and resignation which are daily exerted by the sorrowing and suffering is beyond all computation, because it is seldom published and exposed. This is especially true of those ills which come or seem to come from causes wholly beyond human control. Providence has a way of sending balm with the wounds that are inflicted by its forces; and, though many people could not possibly formulate their philosophy, they are able to do what so many metaphysical philosophers are not,—apply that philosophy to life, and get some inspiration from it.

The evils hardest to bear for many are those which come from the wilfulness of man, the evils we bring upon ourselves or those which come upon us through human cruelty, oppression, and injustice. We cannot blame the order of the universe, for instance, for the Armenian horrors, for the terrors of lynching in the South, and for the injustice which comes from human selfishness. There is nothing in the physical laws of the world, nothing in the moral laws, which compels injustice and cruelty. Long ago, in the Greek epic, one of the gods was made to say that men bring upon themselves vastly more evil than the gods send to them. It is under such self-reproach that men often commit suicide. It is not that they are disgusted with the universe, but that they are disgusted with themselves, and wish then to escape from their own society. When it comes to the injustice inflicted by others, there is another element in human nature which often comes to the rescue. It is, in its crudest and lowest form, the desire to live until vengeance has been effected,—in a higher form, the heroic resolve to combat oppression and injustice until they are slain or driven from the field. This combative element, this power of moral indignation, this love of liberty and justice, have nerved men to endure the most terrible hardships to effect their noble purposes.

In his subtle article in the October number of the International Journal of Ethics Dr. William James of Harvard University has treated the subject, "Is Life Worth Living?" with characteristic originality. "By many men," says Dr. James,—and we should add the great majority,—"the question of life's worth is answered by temperamental optimism that makes them incapable of believing that anything seriously evil can exist." Such a fact ought to have more place, perhaps, in answering this question than is assigned to it. If in the great majority of cases life furnishes verification of its own value, then life cannot be considered, on the whole, a failure. It is worth something to share with the animals that abundance of what we call "animal spirits," which gives a normal zest to life. A good basis of physical health affects not only physical, but moral and intellectual views of life. We cannot eliminate the personal equation in any report which observers make of the universe. No one is empowered to speak for the whole of humanity: each one is reporting his personal experience. If the optimist cannot convince us that his views are not colored by his temperament, neither can the pessimist. The universe that Schopenhauer reports to us is Schopenhauer's, and that is all. With a different temperament and experience, Schopenhauer becomes a glowing optimist.

It is a question whether purely philosophical pessimism is very influential in the world, and whether philosophy can furnish itself a cure for it. Yet there are many thinking men and women who ought to read Dr. James's article, not because they are in danger of committing suicide, but because they are not living really in a way to prove that life is worth the living. Their lives are apathetic and half-hearted. They are willing to let the universe take care of itself. Brushing aside all sophistries of speculation, metaphysical or scientific, Dr. James says, "This life is worth living, we can say, since it is what we make it, from the moral point of view; and we are bound to make it from that point of view, so far as we have anything to do with it, a success." And, again: "For my own part, I do not know what the sweat and blood and tragedy of this life mean, if they mean anything short of this. If this life be not a real fight, in which something is eternally gained for the universe by success, it is no better than a game of private theatricals from which one may withdraw at will. But it feels like a real fight, as if there were something really wild in the universe which we, with all our idealities and faithfulnesses, are needed to redeem."

We have no space to give an outline to Dr. James's argument. We refer our readers to the International Journal of Ethics. But, after all, it is not so much argument as inspiration which is needed; and this is what makes the article most valuable. It closes with a trumpet call:—

"These, then, are my last words to you. Be not afraid of life. Believe that life is worth living, and your belief will help create the fact. The 'scientific proof' that you are right may not be clear before the day of judgment (or some stage of Being which that expression may serve to symbolize) is reached. But the faithful fighters of this hour, or the beings that then and there will represent them, may then turn to the faint-hearted, who here decline to go on, with words like those with which Henry IV. greeted the tardy Crillon after a great victory had been gained,—'Hang yourself, Crillon: we fought at Arques, and you were not there.'"

THE DOCTRINE OF THE REMNANT.

Matthew Arnold had a favorite lecture, in which he took his text from the Hebrew history, to illustrate how reforms and forward movements are all worked out by a few persons,—“the remnant.” There is much in the present situation of liberal religion to re-enforce Mr. Arnold's doctrine. It might, indeed, appear to sanguine readers of the Christian Register, especially in view of the eloquent papers lately read at Washington, that we are on a vast rising tide of freedom and light. There is no need to dispute this buoyant confidence. It is really involved in our faith in God. On the other hand, it is not true to suppose that any large number of the people of the United States have caught our splendid vision.

Grant that the tide runs our way. There are too many counter-currents and eddies in sight upon the surface to make the deeper and central flow obvious. In fact, it is the few, and not the many, in our little group of churches who have really read the inspiring Washington addresses. How many of our own people can tell what the words are of the beautiful Saratoga motto?

Here, for instance, are straws which do not seem to float our way. A recent number of the Outlook—that most genial and advanced of “evangelical” papers—prints a plan for church unity, which, while most gracious to others, distinctly limits its fellowship in a form to exclude James Martineau! On our own side of the line, we face the fact that never in our history were so many persons using the time of the Sunday church service for riding and bicycling. “See,” say even our friendly critics, “what the liberal faith comes to in the new generation!”

The doctrine of “the remnant” may seem to go for the discouragement of the heroic few, and to make the many more timid. Mr. Arnold did not use it so. This is not its real interpretation. On the contrary, it is a tonic and inspiration. Let us face it, as a child in his bath faces the cold water, and see how invigorating it is. When, in all the realm of nature, some new and higher thing is to be achieved, there is a call for volunteers. Nature does not throw all her forces into the new species. The great mass of material remains, and waits for the result. There is an element of hardihood, venture, and risk about the new thing. The new flower or fruit is a type of moral life. There is nothing disheartening in this. When, in the spring-time, the volume of the sap goes, upon the conservative side, to fortify the trunk, to thicken the limbs of the tree, and to make the bark solid, there is nothing disheartening, if only a little radical remnant rushes to run the risks of drought and devouring insects and beasts, and to feed the tender graft of the new kind of fruit. This is the rule of evolution. It has its analogies in the realm of human life, and not least of all in the growth of religion.

Grant that mankind had its childhood in animalism, and there is nothing seriously to depress us, but much to stir vigorous, new life in us, at the fact that materialism and even material and sensuous forms of religion survive. The wonder, rather, is at the glorious ideals, the illustrious examples, and the actual achievements that man has to show in the way of a higher life.

Suppose, now, that it is given to any of us to catch vision of the new needs and the new movements of life; suppose that we hear God's call to be among his volunteers for the ventures and risks of the new growth,—what is this but a noble privilege! “The remnant” proves to be the vanguard of God's forces. The opportunity and responsibility are so great and our accomplishment is so inadequate as to keep us at the same time very modest and exceedingly glad.

But is it not depressing when members of our own churches and our young people care little, give little, and make no sacrifice for this ennobling faith? This is only a part of the general rule about “the remnant.” It is not only that few are enrolled on the side of the higher thing. It is also that the remnant is only a fraction of the few. From the days of “Gideon's band” it has always been so.

There are special reasons why this rule holds to-day with us. It is hard to realize how grand and costly a thing we undertake in religion. Men once said, “Give God one day in seven and a tithe of your income.” We preach a religion that makes all time divine service and all property a stewardship for the welfare of man. There is no corner of life into which the spirit of the religion of the Golden Rule does not enter. It is small wonder that it is easier to praise the Saratoga motto than to trust it as the law of life.

All this has a practical application. The danger is that earnest people will trust too easily that our cause has conquered. “Do not the stars in their courses fight with us?” But when was ever the time that the Almighty let the stars bring victory to his sons! The fact is, the special need to-day is loyalty and devotion. We will not say “sacrifice,” holding that the word ceases to have any meaning whenever men have got a gospel. It is well, then, to make up our minds that the work of the present, like all the most glorious work in the past, must be done mostly by the few who love it and believe in it. If new activity is demanded in our churches, let no one be disappointed to discover that a few must take the lead and give their time, before the many will follow. If a Sunday-school, a guild, or an alliance is to be started or maintained, let not the few complain that they must bear the brunt of the effort. What else are they here for? Least of all, let them ever despise the majority for their apathy. They will win the many rather by their courage, patience, good temper, and cheerfulness.

The truth is, history is a continuous record of what the few, if on right lines, have been able to accomplish, whenever they have taken a definite aim. The world has become a vast system of answer to their prayers. Let “the remnant” in any one of our churches resolve to bring our new motto into effect, to reinvigorate their church life, to fill their seats or their treasury,—above all, to bring their religion to bear for the welfare of their community. There was never more excellent human material, albeit somewhat slow and cautious, ready to hand, waiting to be generously led. It will not move of itself. It wants the warm, hearty touch of life. If one-tenth of the people in our churches began to tell the other nine-tenths and their neighbors outside how good, restful, and uplifting our religion is, we should straightway have a new kind of revival.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME.

The mystic words of the old prophets frequently escape our understanding; but the burdened heart has comforted itself often with the expression, applied to suit its own needs, “It shall come to pass that at evening time it shall be light.” At this special season, when the devout soul counts over its mercies to increase the sense of gratitude, there is one cause that is never too often recalled,—the blessing of the noble example of long lives in whose evening shines the bright, uninterrupted, serene light of Christian faith and hope. The soldier goes into the battle inspired by martial music, and looks death for himself or his comrade unflinchingly in the face. The weary invalid, tired of pain and exhaustion, sighs for repose, and cares not how soon the end shall come. The active business man, with clear head and steady purpose, unharassed by care, may feel that life is bright now; and, no matter how long he may live, his light of faith will always shine. But he may be cut off in the midst of his years, and we cannot know whether the prophecy for him would have held good. We may comfort ourselves with thinking that our own faith will keep bright to the end, and that for us at evening time it shall be light; but our great inspiration must come not from our inward confidence, but from seeing those who have left the fever and heat of the day far behind, whose feet no longer stir up the way-side dust, but who in sweet serenity lay aside the cares and duties of the outside world, and brighten by their calm sunshine the homes which they still bless. What has proved possible for them may be possible for us.

Such lives may have much physical suffering over which the spirit shall triumph gloriously, so that lessons of courage and heroism, as well as faith, are learned in their presence; or they may be quiet and uneventful, undisturbed by care, untouched by sorrow. Sometimes we ask ourselves how sorrow would affect these placid souls?

Would the torrent of grief tear new channels in the quiet hearts that are beating out the measure of a life that began almost with the century? Could they bear anguish, sudden grief? To the one who can say, “My heart is fixed, my heart is fixed, O God, on thee,” the shock may come; but it does not loosen the invisible ties of trust. The blackness of sorrow may roll over the soul; but it does not eclipse the clear shining of the light. The agony of the loss of the beloved may come like a Gethsemane; but the heart accustomed to looking always for blessings surmounts the wreck of hopes, and finds even there things for which to give thanks.

“Oh,” said one of an aged friend, called to bear deep sorrow, “why could she not have been spared this? Why did she not go first?” “Nay,” said another, “what would the world have lost in the lesson it has received of the way to meet grief?”

Who would not be willing to live to be old if every added year brought added friends and added graces? Who would not even bear trouble, if need be, if thereby the character could be made like refined gold, spotless and pure? But the shining of the light at evening time is not a will-of-the-wisp, a fitful gleam coming with the decay of powers. It is the steady flame fed for scores of years by the oil of perennial faith. It has been shining all the way through, and will burn brighter and brighter unto the perfect day. Let us kindle our tapers at the same source.

LEVITY IN DRESS.

We learn in our school-books that the love of decoration precedes the love of comfort, and that the primitive man—that incomplete creature with whom his remote descendants delight to compare themselves—covered his body with red ochre for the sake of beauty long before he made clothes for the sake of warmth. Traces of this early preference may still be found in civilized society,—a survival, perhaps, that indicates the domination of instinct over education. The genuine difficulties that meet a woman who has once made up her mind to breathe and move naturally are evidences of this. It is in vain that artists insist on certain standards of beauty, and tell us that these abide, though fashions change. They tell us that dress, to be artistic, must follow the lines of the body, that materials must fall in their natural folds, unrestrained and undistorted by stiff linings, that nothing is beautiful which suggests useless suffering, and that everything must be judged in its relation to something else. We all listen with absorbed attention, and proceed to put our newly acquired knowledge into practice by studying works of art with enthusiastic agreement; but the capricious dictates of the dressmaker or the milliner are unaltered, and their rule goes on forever.

In the woman's column of a contemporary magazine lately it was authoritatively announced that pink ribbons were entirely suitable for elderly ladies. No one who has noticed how a bit of that color sometimes sets off the soft white hair and still fresh complexion of some beautiful grandmother will wish to dispute this; but it recalls irresistibly the scene when Mrs. Thoreau, with her pink ribbons, called one day on Mary Moody Emerson, a woman who had no hesitation in admonishing others for the good of their souls. Miss Emerson closed her eyes, and conversed with Mrs. Thoreau for a time. By and by she said, “Mrs. Thoreau, I don't know whether you have observed that my eyes are shut?” “Yes, Madam, I have observed it,” said Mrs. Thoreau. “Perhaps you would like to know the reasons?” “Yes, I should,” was the answer. “I don't like to see a person of our age guilty of such levity in dress.”

Her telling phrase, “levity in dress,” occurs to the mind often when one sees the foundation principles of beauty ignored in the desire to put the main emphasis on decoration, no matter in what department of life it occurs. Michel Angelo declared that the essence of beauty must be sought in “the purgation of superfluities,” and the art of omission is everywhere a secret of power. If one has the opportunity of watching the course of instruction in English by a competent university instructor, it is interesting to note how this removal of superfluities seems to be the point mainly insisted on. Have something to say, have an idea to start with, and then say it, don't talk round it, is the insistent word again and again repeated. Seek first the kingdom of simplicity and directness, that the graces of style may be added unto you. This is as true in dress as it is in literature or in art or in character. Everywhere beauty is the consistent expression of a thought that is true.

When the artist tells us that nothing is fair which suggests useless suffering, we see at once why it is that no face, however beautiful in itself, can express anything but thoughtlessness or cruelty when it is shaded by a hat on which is placed the soft breast of a mother bird, taken ruthlessly from her starving little ones, or wings torn from some bright creature that might still be making the pure air and the golden sunlight more beautiful by its glancing presence. One thing can be beautiful only when it is in proper relation to other things. Let us have pink ribbons by all means, but not as the one essential. Let us have rich materials, but always with artistic consideration of surroundings. Beauty is not a reluctant, far-away goddess, tempted only by lavish expenditure and exclusive devotion. It is the companion of sincerity and perfect adaptation of construction to purpose. It delights to reward the seeing eye and the listening ear and the appreciative heart when it is least expected or sought; and yet, on the other hand, its demands are imperative, for it admits nothing that is untrue into its realm.

Musings.

I SPOKE last week of some letters that had come over the ocean. This week I am thinking of a message that came under it. I have seen the lightning play around the heads of the grand mountains of Switzerland, when the bolt threatened to descend into the valley. But now the bolt has struck five thousand miles away as well as near at hand. The message which came in letters of fire, with its vivid surprise, was a message of death. Switzerland is a grand country to live in, and it is a grand country to die in. One may look unto the hills from whence cometh our help; and it must be a cold heart, as cold as the everlasting glaciers on the mountain sides, that is not kindled in the presence of these monuments of the Eternal Power, when with this vision there goes the faith that this Power is one that makes for righteousness and goodness.

WHAT a superb mausoleum under the shadow of Mont Blanc, the Matterhorn, or the Rigi, and the peaks that are marshalled around them! But a few months ago I was rejoicing in the beauties of the Valley of Chamounix; and I carry in my mind ineffaceable memories of Lucerne and its exquisite lake and mountain walls. To me they are all associated with the new vigor of life which seemed to come from companionship with nature then and there, from putting these mountains under my feet and crossing the glaciers and sailing on the calm waters. But now I think of Switzerland as a place to step off, as a mount of ascension for my friend. "Switzerland," he wrote, "is a paradise of beauty." It was grandly enjoyable, but as grandly inexpressible.

HE celebrated his birthday among these inspiring scenes; and I think that, even more than mountains and glaciers, was he touched by the flowers that loving hands had brought to his doors. "How pleasant it is," he wrote, "to have people love you!" There was music for him in the vibration of souls delicately attuned to each other; and he had often made this music in the heart, as well as music on the air. In the midst of love and grandeur and beauty he ascended, leaving behind the glow of his own heart, which was never benumbed by any chill in the world, and which left it warmer than when he came into it.

Brevities.

A subject which will receive much attention to-day: the dismemberment of Turkey.

"I found this a pleasant world to live in," said the late Dr. Edward Bright of the Examiner; and thousands will gratefully say, "Amen!"

People who like to combine philanthropy and pleasure may do so at the entertainment to be given at Copley Hall, Boston, next week in behalf of the Armenians, though their pitiful state should of itself command a large sale of tickets. Full particulars are given in our column of "Charities and Reforms."

Prof. Herron of Grinnell College, Iowa, won a good hearing in Boston last week by his lectures on different aspects of Christian socialism. He is no more orthodox in his theology than in his political economy. But the Observer shakes its head, and speaks of his "mongrel philosophy," and that he "mixes enough false doctrines to destroy the good."

"We receive everything," says Amiel, "both life and happiness; but the manner in which we receive,—this is what is still ours. Let us never be afraid of innocent joy. God is good, and what he does is well done. We must dare to be happy and dare to confess it, regarding ourselves always as the depositaries, not as the authors, of our own joy."

"On Thanksgiving Day," says Rev. W. C. Gannett, "as we draw our chairs around the table, stop a moment and think over the familiar story, so wonderful and praiseful,—think what miracles have been enacted to spread the table for us, how last spring the dinner lay in minerals and was blowing in the air, and how rains and storms and rise and set of suns and summer noons and starry nights have wrought, till, lo! the squash for our Thanksgiving pies, the cranberries for our sauce!"

The Advance sees in the sermon of Dr. George A. Gordon, delivered before the American Board, "an astonishing unconsciousness of an insidious danger." The dangerous statement is that Christianity has the power to assimilate truth of all religions. Christianity had this assimilative power at the beginning; and, if it is true to its genius, it will have it now. Dr. Gordon's position is not any more insidious or dangerous than the address of Paul on the Areopagus. And, having made this comment ourselves, we find as an interesting coincidence that the Congregationalist has made precisely the same point.

If the old Puritans could come back to-day, they would find a marvellous change in many directions. What with the wonderful growth of our country, the introduction of railroads, telegraphs, electric lights, telephones, ocean greyhounds, printing-presses, electric cars, and other inventions, they might be a good deal bewildered and dazzled by the simple scenery of existence. But they might take occasion to remind us—and it would be well worth listening to their words—that existence does not depend merely upon external scenery, that the kingdom of heaven, after all, is within us, and that, if we look to find it in luxurious materialism, we shall be disappointed. All the improvements we speak of are really only improvements as they may and do help to conserve and promote truth, beauty, and goodness in the world.

Pro and Con.

WANTED.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The Sunday-school at Beachmont would be helped by the gift of new or second-hand books suitable for the Sunday-school library. They would be called for on notice to the minister. E. R. BUTLER.

Revere, Mass.

KING'S CHAPEL NOON SERVICES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Will you kindly call special attention to the Wednesday noon services which will be held again at King's Chapel, beginning on December 4? The marked success of these meetings during last winter insures an equal interest during the season now to commence. The meetings will be held on Wednesdays until Easter, at twelve o'clock, and will close each day promptly at 12.30. They will be conducted by ministers of Boston and vicinity. The hearty co-operation of all is invited. The first service will be led by Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D.

CHRISTOPHER R. ELIOT, Committee.

HUMANE LEAFLETS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The Study Class Committee of the Women's Alliance desire to call the attention of those Branches which have the topic "Humanity to Animals" on their list for discussion to the leaflet, "The Wearing of Egret Plumes," printed by the Humane Education Society of Rhode Island (see address below). This leaflet should be added to those already recommended for this topic. It would do much good if all Branches, whether studying this subject or not, would order a hundred copies of this leaflet for distribution among members attending their meetings. A single copy, as a specimen, may be obtained by addressing the chairman of the committee, Miss L. Freeman Clarke, Jamaica Plain, Mass. Otherwise order from the Humane Education Committee, 61 Westminster Street, Room 32, Providence, R.I. Price 20 cents per hundred, postage 12 cents.

For the Christian Register.

148th PSALM.

BY JOHN CODMAN.

Praise ye the Lord in heaven above,
Ye angels who around him move,—
Ye glorious band of satellites
Who people his eternal heights

Ye first creations of his hand
Who sprang to life at his command,—
A life that by his own decree
Shall lengthen to eternity.

Ye stars in the empyrean height,—
The bright reflectors of his light;
Ye waters from his throne that spring:
Praise ye the name of Zion's King.

Praise him, O earth, in hills and deeps,
Praise him who all thy creatures keeps.
Ye elements, his praise declare,
Ye who his earthly cohorts are.

Mountains and hills and fruitful trees
And cedars waving in the breeze,
Cattle and beasts and creeping things
And birds that spread their snowy wings,

Princes who earthly sceptres sway,
All people who their rule obey,
And ye who give the world its law,—
Stand in your Maker's solemn awe.

Let all mankind, the young, the old,
Praise him for mercies still untold.
Let all his mighty sceptre own
Whose name is excellent alone.

Above our faint conceptions, far
Higher than heaven's remotest star,
Transcends the splendor of his fame,
The honor of his sovereign name.

There are those glorious courts above,—
The many mansions of his love,—
And we, the children of his care,
Shall dwell with him forever there.

ALL SOULS'.

BY ALICE BROWN.

"The old order changeth, giving place to new"; and festivals vary with the years. All too quickly they outgrow their former significance, and become not necessarily lovelier, but something better suited to the altered time. When Thanksgiving Day had birth, the national hardships were concrete and tangible. There was much to endure and something to fight, and there were definite mercies to celebrate when we had overcome. And, though to-day we may be in sadder case than our struggling forefathers, our dangers are in ambush, and not yet to be averted. They are tendencies rather than things. Woful downfall lies latent in our lack of brotherly love, our pseudo-classes, our arrogance of wealth; but all that is a slow fire which need not stop our fiddling for years to come. Therefore, being prosperous, we are the less devout; and the national day is not inevitably a litany of mercies. But it still has tender significance, and chiefly, I think, as a sort of All Souls' Day, wherein we feel the welding of old ties, the strenuous appeal of bygone associations. We go back in spirit, as souls released may let their longings wander down to earth, clasping invisible hands and owning allegiance to human vows. And those of us who were born in the country return there, fancy-led, on this one day when New England especially is never so much herself, when she betrays in every look her birth and growth and state, unlike the conditions of any other land. Then does she clothe herself in a solemn bloom of delight. Every house is a ship from the East, redolent of spices: a bacchanalian prodigality diffuses itself from door to door. The good wife outdoes herself in mince-meat; and the child, though never so strictly reared, puts in his thumb and pulls out forbidden plums, the while his elders wink and turn their backs. We banquet, like emperors, on what is distinctly not good for us, so far as we can obtain it. We have no way of showing an abandonment to bodily delight save by the delicacies of living, and our revelry in pie is simply mutinous. Even the patrons and superiors of the household are not forgotten; for the dog wags himself into marvellous cupboard favor, and pussy dines delicately upon honestly gotten fowl. In families where giblet sauce is not an article of belief, she inherits those necessary appendages of barnyard economy, and, eyes closed in contentment, puts her head on one side, and chews the gizzard very far back in her cheek. Some households there be, of an idealizing tendency, who insist upon the pig's sharing the general feast, and deposit thick triangles of pie before his grunting swinishness. These are they who give the cattle an extra fodder all round,—a loving demonstration that the day is actually a family affair, and that their elastic circle is capable of stretching till it holds the world.

But, when you come to the world, it is very old; and so there is the more need of "dreaming true." The past grows every minute more crowded with images, some of them of such loveliness that we are poor indeed who may not shut our eyes and think ourselves back into other scenes, pouring out for our enriching the precious ointment of the years. In the sweet pauses of our Thanksgiving Day where shall we go to rest? What waters will refresh us, when the mind forsakes the games and tumult of the hour? Most of us, I think, must flee straight to the country. Nay, all,—young and old: there shall be a spiritual exodus, for those who were not born to its observances have an inheritance there, even though it be in the general life of our older forbears. Sit still, and hear the clock tick, and you will remember! Better still, you may even catch glimpses of what you never knew. The ground rings hollow under a "sprinklin'" of snow, not too much to cover delicate branching weeds or blanket the bushes out of sight. All the spent riches of the fall are still ungarnered,—the feathery fruiting of the golden-rod, the red vessels of the rose, the brown leaves clustering on the oak-tree, too thick to rustle sadly. Little flocks of birds shadow the ground, and then whirr into the friendly wood to talk it over. The pine-tree is benignant, comforting. The apple has given her fruitage, and withdrawn serenely into her winter state. Only a scattering of all her store hangs bobbing and shivering on the tree, frozen into that piquant taste we know so well,—a flavor set aside for wild life and gypsy moments. Within doors all is savory warmth and sweetness; and he is a crusty soul indeed who does not yield to the coaxing finger of the time. Guests who are all unused to going beyond their own door-yards "tackle up," and drive miles to renew a lax relationship. They hurry in, not frost-bitten, but briskly stung. (For in our memory-tryst we will have the weather just cold enough, not a shade too cold!) They bring with them into the luxurious kitchen the outdoor air, tangible, penetrating,—the breath of life.

Whom shall we invite to our party? for, in the fairyland of fancy, "what you can do you may do," and we can have anybody we please. Do you remember the dear and gentle old lady whose seemed always to be sitting by the window, knitting, when she was not "helpin'" with the dishes"; who could always fish up peppermints from her long, long pocket; who was afraid of dogs, and yet never saw one without purring a benevolent "Puppy! puppy!" and smuggling a bone for him into the shed; who, though she "set by" her gold beads to the point of idolatry, would thrust them upon any bored child for a plaything, hovering near, meanwhile, in altruistic agony lest they be swallowed; who put forth strenuous ideas on the rearing of children, and yet found it impossible to defend her strongholds against their marauding, and regarded them, from dawn till sundown, with a mild ecstasy of delight; who was a Calvinist by inheritance, and secretly cherished certain schemes for the reformation of the devil, if one could but run him to earth? We will have her.

We will have "Cap'n" Ezra, who was born to serve the sea, and whose every-day talk is flavored with nautical salt. He it is who tells you, when you set the table, that the cloth "needs pullin' a mite to the no'th-east," and remarks that he thought it was going to storm because last night "the rut" was so loud. (The "rut," the ceaseless clangor of the sea,—the prophecy of ill.) He shall come, "and welcome."

John Jeffries, too,—not alone that we love him, but because he has been a pedler all the years since his young wife died (striving to breed patience out of homely wandering), and carries strange histories with his pack. He knows the story of the haunted house "up to Madrid," where the ghost turned out to be Lis'beth Ann's discarded lover, fain to go sighing round the place at odd hours of the night, frightening the family into such hysteria that they bolted the doors as for a siege, and dared not, for their lives, investigate. He can tell us about the wicked bride who stole her father-in-law's tin kitchen because she did not propose cooking without a range, and who sold it for Parian statuettes, and thereafter was well come up with by having the old gentleman's money left to Dely that married the Baptist minister and settled out West. And, having always a heart for business, he shall bring with him, in that delectable black bag, cotton laces, side-combs, cologne, and attar of roses; and we will all buy, and be beautified.

Then there is the little dressmaker who used to go about from house to house, to mend and make, and who, though she had no earthly tie remaining, was a beam of radiance because she believed so heartily that every ill thing would turn to good, and that this must be the best of all possible worlds. She was glad when her mother died, because the call mercifully came just when "mother couldn't seem to bear her cough another minute."

"But ain't you goin' to miss her?" interposed a tactful neighbor; and the little creature answered, with a soldier's lip of steel:—

"I ain't goin' to allow myself to, more'n' I can help. Why, how cropin' I should be if I wanted to keep mother here sufferin'! And, then, 'tain't so long before we shall all be there!"

That was always her cry,—"Tain't so very long!"

On feast days, when families are wont to be together, and when the solitary feels her loneliness at every breath, she seemed to diffuse and scatter gladness, because then she said, "Folks that are gone seem so near."

"Why, I guess they think o' me to-day more'n' common, whatever they're engaged in," she would insist, with happy conviction. "I guess they do!"

And, though acrid old Captain Saunders, who said he was an atheist, and "mighty glad of it because 'twas so coolin' in hot weather," one day scoffingly asked her if she "s'posed" the Thanksgiving proclamation was read in heaven, or whether her folks bought Thomas's "Almanac" up there, her simple faith remained undaunted.

"I guess 'twould be queer if they couldn't find out," she said happily. "If there hadn't been no arrangement till father got there, I guess he'd ha' seen to't. Father's a terrible inventive kind of a man."

We will have her, not out of our charity, since she has nowhere else to go, but because the windows of her faith let in sunshine, and we need it.

And thus, bringing together, by the power of the spirit, the great company of the ever-loved, the never-to-be-forgotten, there shall be at our feast no taint of the bitter aloes of regret. Instead of sadness shall spring up that sweet patience which is willing to abide by the intangible witness of spiritual things. One thought to each of the absent, and the horizon widens, that love after love may come trooping in. The house walls no more contain them: they crowd at the windows, and throw a smile in passing, with the one look that tells how truly they are ours. And, when the day is over, we shall lie down to sleep, wrapped about with the certainty that we have been in that blissful state which we name "heaven" (because, in our stammering, we must name it something),—the state of love renewed which in itself makes an immortal life. The day will have sent its breath, lovely with warmth and spice, into that unknown whither we are joyfully going, and built of it the rainbow bridge of happy dreams.

FLORENCE IN AUTUMN.

BY AUGUSTA LARNED.

You arrive late at the railway station, and drive in the dark to the place where you are to stay, catching, in transit, a glimpse of the square and the black and white cloister of Santa Maria Novella, just sufficient to convince you that you are again in the city of flowers. You go to bed too tired to realize anything but a sense of fatigue. But toward morning the soft, melodious hum of bells awakes you,—bells all murmuring low and musically together, filling the air with a delicate harmony. Where but in Florence will you hear these singing bells that seem so gently to invite sinners to rise and repair to the church for prayer? You do not rise and repair to the church, however deep your personal sense of sin may be; and, when you again awaken from semi-somnolence, the bugles of the bersaglieri, Italian sharpshooters, are sounding from the neighboring barracks a cheery good-morning.

It is all that is needed to convince you that you are in Florence. Perhaps, however, you may be welcomed by a slight earthquake shock,—one of those little shivers and shudderings that still continue to run through the underpinning of the peninsula, and to frighten the nervous. But there is a theory prevalent here, which seems to do something toward quieting the public mind. It is to the effect that these slight movements are a healthy sign, and denote the settling back of the earth to a normal condition of repose, just as a dog turns round his own tail three times before he settles down upon the hearth-rug. The great earthquake of last May is still an absorbing topic of interest, because of what it did, and also because of what it did not do. Its freaks and caprices are told over and over, and the places injured and those which escaped show how endlessly varied experiences were. The number of the killed seems constantly to diminish; and those who walked the streets for nights together, not daring to repose in their beds, are now thought to have acted foolishly. But, still, the extent of the actual injury was very great. Florence is like a cracked vase of rare and precious material, which, though mended with nicety, and altogether as good as new, still carries the memory of the fracture. Had the quake lasted a few seconds longer, it is believed that the city, with all its lovely monuments and treasures, would now be a heap of ruins. Happily, the great spasm ceased just in the nick of time, and the baby convulsions still felt do not count.

The cathedral sustained but a single unimportant crack and the wrenching out of an iron support. The campanile of Giotto, it is said by those who were observing it at the time, swayed at the top about a metre, somewhat more than eighteen inches each way, and then settled back upon its grand old foundations unharmed. As the earthquake occurred at nine in the evening, the means of observation would have been less good, had not the electric lights in the Piazza del Duomo made a mimic day. The effect of these lights in both the great squares is certainly very pleasing. The cathedral wall with its mosaics and statues glows with soft splendor, its warm colors coming out as under sunlight; and the rugged old Palazzo Vecchio and the Loggia dei Lanzi are seen under new and charming conditions.

Happily, the great galleries, the important churches, and works of art escaped injury; but hundreds of apartments were partially shattered, and the autumn has found many people practically homeless and seeking shelter. It is an ill wind that blows no one good, and the artisans of Florence have reaped and are still reaping a golden harvest from the earthquake devastations. They needed it sorely; for the general bankruptcy of two or three years ago rendered the poor people still poorer, not to speak of the constant pressure of excessive taxation. This season a great drouth came to lay burdens on the cultivators. There were three rainless months, of burning, cloudless weather, which dried the grapes, withered the olives, and ruined the chestnuts. But, happily, abundant rains came at last; and we are having Florentine days in perfection. So like our American October in the splendid blue of the skies, so unlike it in changeless verdure and the transparent golden and rosy mists that veil soft distances only to heighten the perfection of outline and rich coloring. Jewelled lights burn on the heights of Bello Sguardo and San Miniato. The Apennines that fold Florence about as with a garment of beauty gleam with white villas and old brown walls through the grayness of olive orchards, and heights accented by the pointed cypress. The ways between gardens are perfumed with the late-blooming oleander and the indescribable sweetness of oleofrancia. Far up the hills are dark chestnut groves; and, as you climb the steep roads that never pause in their course to give you breath, you seem to get into the mind and heart of the old painters who have reproduced every feature of the living landscape. You see with their eyes the clouds, those little rounded masses of golden cumulus, hovering over the hills, and on which angels and cherubs can so conveniently be placed. You see the high-perched convents, their old cloisters and gardens; the little villages, each with its church and campanile; the light-colored villas, with long roads walled in through the vignas. The intensity of the blues, the clumps of dark foliage,—cypress and pine,—recall the old pictures, those bits of landscape of Titian and Filippo Lippi and Ghirlandajo, that linger in your memory long after other painted scenes have faded.

These are the days for country junkets and excursions to the hills about, where from every point of vantage you look down on Florence, with the river like a main artery running through its body, spanned by its charming bridges, and the streets and squares, the cathedral dominating so easily with its dome like a brown bubble of gigantic size, the campanile always like a graceful, slender wife beside it, the Palazzo Vecchio, the dome of San Lorenzo, the black and white façade of Santa Maria Novella, all so slightly, so distinct, so familiar and friendly. No other city can compare with Florence in this peculiar neighborliness that peeps in at window and door, and takes your hand as you walk,—Monte Morello and Fiesole and the heights of San Miniato and Bello Sguardo manifesting themselves in the thick of homes, and refusing to allow the city to become altogether urban. Blue distances with the dark ilex and pointed cypress peep in at the end of every street, and thrust the hills before your eyes, whether you walk on the Viale or saunter along the Lungarno or ramble in the Cascone, or drive out of the Porta Romana to the Colli and the little high-perched square of Michel Angelo, where the grand figure of the great master's David is drawn in bold lines against the sky. There you may lean over the wall, and seem to gather the whole of the dear old city into your heart, with all its traditions and memories,—the city of Dante and Boccaccio and Giotto and Donatello; for, like a magic garment, the past and present are woven in all its fibres.

One who has been absent half a dozen years comes back to find changes. A steam train now crosses the iron bridge, and puffs up the steep incline to San Miniato, and thence to the Certosa in Val d' Ema. It is well to linger there until sunset, when the peaceful little vale is buried in soft purple shadows, and the light rests like a golden crown on the mountain tops. A stately old monk in the cleanest of white woollen robes shows you over the monastery, so dim, and beautiful, and rich with pictures and statuary and stained glass,—those empty colonnades where the steps of the old inmates are fast dying away. The earthquake has tumbled down a large piece of the west wall of the cloister, where the pretty well so often photographed stands in the midst of the little garden and burying-place. Now it is a scene of desolation, and many of the Luca della Robbia heads that adorned the arches lie in ruins. Big cracks are shown you in the monastery wall, but a far larger crack was made in the whole monastic institution in 1870; and the monk in Italy can never again hope to regain his importance of former times.

The trolley, or electric, tram up to Fiesole is even a greater innovation for the Florentines than the Certosa steam one. It starts in that old square of San Marco, almost beside the venerable church and cloister where Savonarola lived and preached, and saw visions, and thundered anathemas against sin and wickedness. The road up the conical hill of Fiesole is very high and steep, unfolding as it goes a panorama of matchless beauty. It twists and twines upon itself like an immense anaconda, with perpendicular slides and sharp turns that make one dizzy to contemplate. On one of the trial trips, when it was first opened some years ago, five persons were killed through the carelessness of a guard, and for a year or more the Florentines would have nothing to do with the dangerous thing; but gradually convenience and cheapness overcame fear, and now the people of Fiesole especially would find it difficult to live without the electric tram. Every car goes up and comes down crowded with passengers. You wind dizzily through the long corkscrew, and are landed on the piazza of Fiesole, where deplorable beggars abound, more persistent and tiresome than others of their class, and withered old women crowd around, seeking to dispose of their fragile straw baskets and fans.

Aside from the glorious prospect of Florence on one side, and on the other of the Apennines, with their broken vales and steep as far as Monte Cinerio and Vallombrosa, the interest lies in the new excavations carried on by the municipality of Fiesole, and which have brought to light an Etruscan wall of large stones laid up without mortar, and a Roman bath in a fairly good state of preservation. Three arches of the bath have been restored; and the tanks, which were evidently floored and lined with marble, and the heating chambers, have been exposed to view. The work is carried on in a vigna and olive orchard, and may yet bring to light objects of even more interest than those already discovered. There are people who deplore the existence of the electric tram, as it is now dangerous to drive along the precipitous road in places bordered by narrow ledges and steep descents. But there are also people who regret the old grand duke and the Austrian rule of twenty-five years ago, and the putting down of the papal power. They cry out at every innovation, and have a special moan to make over the transformed marketplace of Florence, where the tide of change has swept away some foul and disgusting places to make a featureless square, modernly ugly, with a particularly bad statue of Victor Emanuel in the middle. The place is clean, cold, and unimpressive, whereas formerly it was foul, unhealthy, but picturesque. In this day of microbes and bacteria, modern Italy prefers sanitary ugliness to unwholesome artistic effect. Science was ruthless when she decreed the destruction of the old market-place, and undoubtedly she was right.

RUSSIAN LITERATURE.

BY SOPHIE FRIEDLAND.

Our literature is by no means new. It dates from the time of Ruric, the founder of Russia, and the establishment of Christianity in the year 988. Since that period, with the exception of the time when Russia was under the yoke of the Tartars, every century boasts of more or less brilliant writers; but never before has Russian literature attained such a significance as during the last forty years. For the first time Russian literature stood at the head of the intellectual movement in our country, and could be acknowledged as a social power. It answered to all the problems of Russian life, raised and solved them, and reflected, as in a mirror, the faults, weak points, and vices of society, its passions, its noble impulses, and its ideals.

In the awakening of society after the disasters of the Crimean War could be felt the awakening of a giant who, after a sleep of centuries, stretches his limbs, and prepares to make up for his long inactivity.

Society seemed determined to rouse itself and do something for the benefit of humanity; and there was a hope that the old Russian spirit would revive, and Russian life would once more flow in strong, majestic currents.

This social frame of mind was described in a literature at the head of which stood Count Saltikoff, the well-known satirist, who died but a year ago. This literature, denouncing all the faults of the past, the apathy, egotism, and hollowness of our society, strove to point out in glowing colors the benefits of an honest and useful activity, and tried to support the holy flame of the good intentions of its members.

But it soon came to light that repentance, self-accusation, and virtuous endeavors did not lead to the expected result. Abuse remained abuse, disorder remained disorder, and falsehood and ignorance reigned as before.

How could such a thing be possible after so much sincere repentance, such an enthusiasm for a future in which the sins of the past should be redeemed? Count Saltikoff, under the nom de plume of "Tchedrine," answered this question in a number of sketches on "Provincial Life." In these sketches, written with sparkling wit and cutting irony, he pictures the true Russian nature, quickly inflamed to enthusiasm, always ready for heroic self-denial, constantly upbraiding itself for weakness, vulgarity, and uselessness, but without the energy and the moral force to conquer these faults.

The Russia of forty years ago swarmed with gifted people; but, although not devoid of good qualities, they were of no use either to themselves or to others.

Tchedrine pictures them spending the greater part of the day walking about in a dressing-gown and, for want of something better to do, whistling.

Others, who were able to conquer their laziness, became provincial Mephistopheleses. A third group dealt in horses or gambled; a fourth drank great quantities of brandy, regretted the past, and protested against the present state of things.

The so-called intellectual class, the leading class of society, Tchedrine has described in two satirical novels, which were the cause of his banishment to Vjatka.

Tchedrine paints the poverty and suffering of the Russian peasant, his silent resignation and his simple faith, and succeeds in awakening a sad consciousness of the true state of social affairs.

Our best writers, Gouchevoff, Tourguéneff, Tolstoi, Ostrovsky, Peesemsky, and others, have treated the same subject; and we meet in every one of their works the same characters,—described in a different frame of mind, which plainly denotes the character of the writer.

Saltikoff (Tchedrine) criticises society with an inexhaustible wit,—not in a genial way, but with cutting scorn and a humor which makes society wince. Through the works of Tourguéneff flows a broad, deep wave of melancholy.

His chief domain as a writer are the poor, the weak, the untrustworthy, the superfluous, and the abandoned. His stories, "A Correspondence," "An Unfortunate Woman," "The Diary of a Superfluous Man," "Jacob Passinkoff," and, principally, "The Living Relic," are the best specimens of these monographs of misfortune. Still, it is not these minor works which have made Tourguéneff's name renowned throughout the world. It is his greater novels, masterpieces, like "On the Eve," "Rudin," "Spring Floods," "Smoke," and "Virgin Soil," that have rendered his name great.

Tourguéneff is certainly the greatest artist in Russian literature, and foreigners have understood him better on this account; but it is not the describer of Russian culture that Europe and America have admired in him. He has peopled the great Russian empire with human beings of the present time. He has given pictures from all ranks and classes of society, from the Russian forests and steppes, from spring and autumn. He has drawn the serf and the princess, the peasant and the proprietor, and the Russian student. Although the greater part of his life had been spent in Paris, he never described anything but his own country. His last great work is "Virgin Soil," a work of which Russians do not approve. We involuntarily feel that the author belongs less to us than before: we feel clearly that he has lived for a long time out of the country. Although his works were not prohibited, yet the Russian government looked with distrust at the growing interest of our youth in Tourguéneff's works; and I have heard it said that the czar refused, at first, to have his body buried on Russian soil. I do not know whether this is true, but I very well remember his funeral. In perfect quiet, like a convict, the man was buried who had given the widest reputation to the name of Russia.

Count Tolstoi is more appreciated abroad than at home. He also, like the greater number of our writers, is a friend of the people.

He teaches, above everything else, that a people can only be happy when they have the fewest necessities. Hence the return to the primitive condition, which he finds in the simple life of the peasant.

The government is not afraid of Tolstoi: the genial dreamer is not regarded as dangerous.

Of late Tolstoi has devoted his efforts to writing for the people. He has determined to turn to the hundred million instead of the upper ten thousand. He has written a series of short narrative legends, symbolical stories, and tales, which, thanks to his disinterestedness, are sold for about two copecks (one cent) a number. These books are meant to give to the Russian peasant, who is by degrees awakening from a sleep of a thousand years, the food which is suited to his mind. They are, to a great extent, of a religious nature,—of that religion which teaches to hold out the right cheek when the left has been struck. That is what our people have been doing all along. It is time they changed.

Tolstoi believes in the Russian people, and distrusts the culture of Western Europe. Tolstoi does not advance our literature, which is not in its decadence, but in full prosperity. "War and Peace," "Anna Karenina," "Boyhood and Youth," as well as his short stories, are masterpieces.

THOMAS TREADWELL STONE, D.D.

The death on the 13th inst. of Rev. Dr. Stone of Bolton, Mass., at the age of ninety-five, has taken from the Unitarian ministry and from Bowdoin College their oldest representative. His life was the uneventful one of a country pastor, save for six years spent with the First Church in Salem. This exception gave Dr. Stone the opportunity to show that moral and intellectual perdition which consists in being "safe."

"When for the truth one ought to die."

He saved his soul alive by faithfulness to the cause of the slave, and accepted with cheerfulness the comparative obscurity which followed his heroism, instead of the prominence which his noble character, his inspiring eloquence, and his refined culture should have secured such a man in a more normal world. He was born in Maine, was graduated at Bowdoin College in 1820, ordained in Andover, Me., the same year, taught in the Bridgeton Academy, and was settled over the First Congregational Church in East Machias for fourteen years. His liberality in theology (Dr. Stone always belonged to the Broad Church) led him to join the Unitarian body. In Salem he learned, like others before and after, that the world had not yet made up its mind to accept Christianity, "liberal" or otherwise, in a way to interfere with vested interests. It is hardly conceivable now that the abolition of slavery in the way that so true a friend of all men (white as well as black), so fervid a preacher, so winning a gentleman, so evident a son of the spirit as Dr. Stone, must have preached it, could have alienated people in the pews worthy to be saved. But the saints of abolitionism had to suffer as well as its fanatics, and none could have borne his testimony with more "sweet reasonableness" than he. Preaching at Bolton, Mass., for a number of years, he afterward had charge of the small society in Brooklyn, Conn., and returned to Bolton to spend the remainder of his life in the lettered quiet which he loved, far from the madding crowd, which never attracted him.

Dr. Stone was a born Platonist and Transcendentalist; and the movement of thought which did so much between 1830 and 1850 to broaden and quicken the thought of America found in him a ready convert and an inspired herald. My acquaintance with this Israelite without guile began when he was seventy-five years of age; but even then one could easily imagine, from his occasional public discourse and from his elevated converse of every day, how the winged words must have flown from his youthful lips with great power to uplift and edify the inward man. Dr. Stone was not one of those accommodating preachers who take one's hand on the common ground of ordinary fact, and lead one easily up, step by step, to the highest view of truth they have attained. Rather, with one strong beat of its wings, his seraph-thought rose to the supernal ether of divine principles and celestial ideals, and there moved about rejoicingly, beholding the fair intelligences of the heavenly vision. Though the common people may have heard gladly such a sublime gospel, it is no cause for wonder that they did not always hear understandingly! So this "modest, retiring, deep, and interior man," in Mr. Frothingham's words, "a child of the spiritual philosophy, which he faithfully lived in and up to, and preached with singular fulness and richness of power," had to be content with effectually reaching a few. Having the happy gift of eternal youth, he rejoiced in his age that he could listen to the preaching of others receptively rather than critically; and, as he looked for the best always in others, it was aroused to friendly life in all who met him.

Dr. Stone was one of the most thoroughly cultivated men whom I have known. If culture means, above all, loving converse, year after year, with the choice and master spirits of our kind, Dr. Stone pursued the path of the highest culture with singular diligence. Chapters every day from the Hebrew and Greek Testaments, Plato's Dialogues, Milton's godlike strain, Wordsworth's devout verse, with many another classic of literature and religion, formed his usual fare. His Transcendental faith had no hostility for the late words of natural science: his interest was intelligent and active in the great events of the outside world. But in the pure, substantial sphere of the noblest books of all time he found his dearest joy and his deepest life. Not a critic or a pedant, he sought everywhere the tokens of increasing truth and broadening love, dwelling upon the unities of the faith of man with a constant preference. Blessed with a wife whose practical genius admirably supplemented his own more spiritual bias, he was more than blessed in that she revered the gift that in him lay, and allowed nothing superable by her to obstruct his intellectual growth and his devotion to the things of the spirit. Who that knew them knew a truer marriage, a more faithful and consecrating bond of love and service?

Of Dr. Stone's volumes "The Rod and the Staff," "Sermons," his contributions to the Dial and other periodicals, and his course of Lowell Institute lectures on "English Literature," I may not here speak: the volume which might more effectively have preserved his name among the authors of his time remained an unsubstantial reality. The influence of such dedicated spirits upon those who knew them in the flesh is often their greatest achievement. Every friend of Dr. Stone respected the pure strain of unaffected devoutness which converted this world into a temple of God, and loved that childlike simplicity which saw the best in every man. For those who were privileged to know him closely his departure impoverishes the earth; and confirms their faith in the eternity of the spirit.

NICHOLAS P. GILMAN.

AUGUSTUS WOODBURY, D.D.

Another prominent and highly esteemed Unitarian minister has passed away by the death of Dr. Woodbury, which recently took place at Concord, N.H. For some time he had been a sufferer from a chronic illness, but not until recently was his immediate death looked for. He was born in Beverly, Mass., Dec. 4, 1825, studied at Phillips Academy, Exeter, N.H., was graduated from the Divinity School at Cambridge in 1849, and was very soon ordained as minister over the Second Congregational Society at Concord, N.H. After a few years, to the great regret of his parishioners, he resigned, to take charge of Lee Street Church, which had been organized in Lowell, Mass. He continued his acceptable labors in this city until he was installed Aug. 2, 1857, as the successor of Dr. Hedge to the pulpit of the Westminster Congregational Society of Providence, R.I. Here he remained during a ministry of thirty-five years.

Dr. Woodbury, in addition to his parish duties, filled very many places of trust and honor. He was a member of the House of Representatives, General Assembly of Rhode Island, 1863-64, and again 1874-75. He was chairman of the inspectors of the Rhode Island State Prison, 1866-77, and was one of the commissioners for building the new State Prison, 1874-79. He was chaplain, Department of Rhode Island, Grand Army of the Republic, 1872-74, and chaplain-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, 1873-75. He was a director of the Providence Athenæum for sixteen years, from 1859, and for a number of years vice-president. He was also for years treasurer of the Providence Charitable Fuel Society. For two terms of three years each he was chosen director of the American Unitarian Association, and was also at one time president of the Alumni Association of the Divinity School of Cambridge, and received in 1866 the degree of A.M. from Harvard University. For a long time he held a very prominent place in the government of the Channing Conference, and was interested in the affairs of Brown University, from which institution he received in 1888 the degree of D.D. At the beginning of the late war he became chaplain of the Rhode Island Regiment, of which Burnside was colonel; and he not only filled this position with great acceptance, but also rendered by his efficiency such valuable service as an aide that, when his colonel was promoted to a higher command, the latter urged him to accept a permanent place on his staff. This he declined because he preferred the work of the ministry. So wide-spread were his activities that few, if any, ministers of his time left so deep a mark upon the civic, charitable, educational, and religious life of the city of Providence.

Notwithstanding the variety and extent of his labors, he concentrated his efforts chiefly on the duties of his pulpit and his parish. As a preacher, he was marked for his ability and clearness of thought. His mind was pre-eminently practical; and his favorite themes were those which bore on daily life, and aimed to stimulate a pure and lofty religious growth. The variety of his published sermons and books illustrates both the activity and bent of his mind.

Though Dr. Woodbury was a devoted minister, he was also pre-eminently a man of administrative ability. As chaplain in the army, director of the American Unitarian Association and the Channing Conference, or at the head of the Unitarian Mission in Providence, he showed a practical sagacity, sound judgment, and wise discernment, such as distinguish those who have been trained in business enterprises. In him were joined the prescience of the man of affairs and the faithfulness of the devotee. In private life he was attractive by his genial spirit; and many were drawn to him by his kindly cheerfulness, rich-toned voice, and ringing laughter. He entered with quick sympathy into the joys and sorrows of others; and, though entirely free from gush or cant, he could feel for those who were in tears and rejoice with those who were in gladness. This added to his efficiency as a pastor and endeared him to many hearts. Perhaps his crowning quality was that of faithfulness to duty. What he had to do he did with thoroughness. He was a man of clear and fixed convictions, and valued most of all religion as a vital power in the soul to work out moral and spiritual results. His faith was pre-eminently cheerful; and, though lately he often suffered acute pain, he bravely bore the infliction with serenity and courage. Cared for and watched by those nearest and dearest, he passed on. His was pre-eminently a faithful and useful life.

S. W. BUSH.

Conferences.

THE MIDDLE STATES AND CANADA.

The eleventh annual meeting of the Conference of the Middle States and Canada held a splendid series of meetings in the First Unitarian Church in Brooklyn, N.Y., from November 19 to 21 inclusive. The first day was stormy; and this, no doubt, prevented some from coming out who would otherwise have been present. But during the night the weather cleared, and on the second day the people were present in large numbers. The attention was eager and earnest, and it may safely be said that the many fine papers that were read did not fail of their intended purpose of uplifting and instructing. The ladies of the society served a substantial luncheon in the chapel adjoining the church, on both days of the sessions; and a charming feature was the small tables, around which six or seven congenial spirits could be seated. If the Conference accomplished no other definite good than to promote the fellowship and acquaintance of the ministers and laymen of its constituency, its work would not be small nor unimportant. And this it does, and much else besides.

The conference sermon was preached on Tuesday evening by Rev. Joseph May of Philadelphia, from the text, "And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us" (John i. 14). Mr. May most eloquently showed that incarnation was not exceptional and miraculous in the case of Jesus, but that it is realized in the experience of all men just in the proportion to which they are faithful in living the divine life and in receiving the spirit of truth into their minds and hearts.

The Wednesday morning session opened with a devotional meeting which, in the absence of Rev. W. I. Lawrence of Meadville, Pa., was conducted by Rev. George H. Badger of Rutherford, N.J. That Nestor of our Unitarian fold, Rev. Dr. Furness of Philadelphia, then read his remarkable paper on "The Naturalness of Jesus,"—the same that he read before the National Conference at Washington. A particularly beautiful and touching incident in connection with this morning service was the christening of a baby girl by Dr. Furness, who twenty-eight years before performed the same service for the little one's mother.

The business session was then opened, and the appointment of committees and the secretary's and treasurer's reports followed. The latter showed that the balance on hand at the beginning of the year was $3,456.60. The receipts during the year were $3,875.85. The expenditures were $3,825.67, leaving a balance on hand of $3,506.78.

The report of the secretary, Rev. D. W. Morehouse, reviewed the year's work, and showed that, in spite of the financial stringency, it had been one of the most prosperous in the history of the conference. Three new churches have been organized, all in New York State,—one at Albany, one at Gouverneur, and one at Parkside, a suburb of Buffalo. "Forward Movement" meetings have been successfully initiated and carried on in Brooklyn, N.Y. Some of the newer churches—notably, that at Pittsburg, Pa., and some of those in New Jersey—have made very satisfactory progress. The report further recommended the subscription plan for raising money for missionary and other purposes. In every case increasingly satisfactory results have followed its adoption.

The remainder of the morning was devoted to a paper on "The Missionary Motive," by Mr. George W. Stone of Boston, and one on "The Missionary Method," by Rev. Arthur H. Grant of Newburg, N.Y. Mr. Stone said that the real missionary motive was to save men from sin and error; and that this is one of the underlying principles of the Unitarian Church, the real missionary motive of which should be to make religion, as accepted and interpreted by Unitarians, universal. Mr. Grant's paper was full of novel suggestions as to missionary methods. He advocated the use by the church of the modern newspaper as a means of making known, through its advertising columns, certain important truths. Rev. George Batchelor, owing to the lateness of the hour, did not discuss these papers in detail, but gave a stirring address on our mission as a Unitarian Church.

The Committee on Nominations reported the following list of nominees: president, Hon. Dorman B. Eaton of New York; vice-presidents, Rev. Robert Collyer of New York, Mrs. J. P. Illsley of Philadelphia, Henry B. Wells of Plainfield, N.J., Rev. Thomas R. Slicer of Buffalo, Rev. Joseph May of Philadelphia, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper of Brooklyn; secretary, Rev. D. W. Morehouse of New York; treasurer, Howland Davis of New York; trustees, Rev. James T. Bixby, Edward W. Clark, John Harsen Rhoades, and Rev. John W. Chadwick; directors, Rev. J. P. Illsley, Rev. Robert Collyer, Rev. Merle St. C. Wright. These officers were unanimously elected.

The topics for the afternoon were particularly interesting. "Our Work in Country Towns" was treated by Rev. John M. Scott of Ithaca, N.Y. He favored the formation of Sunday circles in the rural neighborhoods to receive the same recognition as churches in the matter of sending delegates to conferences, etc. He believed that in small communities there should be one union church among the orthodox believers and one among the liberals. The latter should not be called "Unitarian" or any other denominational name, but by some such title as the "Church of the Good Samaritan." Rev. W. M. Brundage, Ph.D., of Albany, spoke very eloquently and earnestly on "Our Work in Cities," which, he believed, lay in reaching the young men whose minds reject the supernatural religion of the evangelical churches, and who have not yet found that rational and natural religious faith which we have to offer. Rev. Hobart Clark of Plainfield, N.J., followed with an admirable paper on "Reasons why Unitarians should go to Church." The first reason is that, if he (the Unitarian) is not there, the church itself is not there. Each Unitarian is himself a church. He should go not merely for what benefit he may receive, but for the benefit he may confer. The foregoing papers were discussed by Rev. Charles E. St. John of Pittsburg, Pa., who took the high ground that no man could be a whole man, normally developed, except as a regular helper and follower of the church.

The platform meeting in the evening was presided over by Rev. Stephen H. Camp, in the temporary absence of Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, the president. The subject, "Religious Tendencies, or the Change of Base from Supernatural to Natural Religion," was divided into three parts. "The Contribution of Universalism" was assigned to Rev. W. S. Crowe, D.D., of Newark, N.J. "The Contribution of Reformed Judaism" was given to Rev. Gustave Gottheil, D.D., of New York, and "The Contribution of Unitarianism" to Rev. John W. Chadwick. Dr. Crowe's address was full of wit and fire, and aroused a good deal of enthusiasm. His argument was that the change from supernatural to natural religion had not been one of base, but of superstructure. The original base is unchanged, but the mediæval superstructure is removed. The new building must be on the basis of the dominance of spirit. Dr. Gottheil said that the ancient race of which he was a member had done much to remove some of those conceptions of Deity under which we have suffered so long. The question was often asked him whether the ancient law was still binding with them. The wise answer was that all outward institutions have only a temporary value. Have we given up the idea of a chosen people? Yes, in the idea of a physical continuity; no, in the sense of a mission to teach the world the truths of a sublime and rational religion. Mr. Chadwick, the last speaker of the evening, gave one of his most thoughtful and scholarly addresses. He said that Unitarianism had had a threefold character,—a movement of thought in the interest of science, of ethics in the interest of reform, and of religion in the interest of humanity.

On Thursday Rev. Frank S. C. Wicks of Passaic conducted the devotional service, speaking for a brief space on "The Moral Responsibility of Admiration." His warning that we should praise with care and discrimination for fear of establishing low ideals brought Rev. Robert Collyer to his feet, who, in line with what Mr. Wicks had said, spoke a few acceptable words on the graciousness of praise. In lieu of a women's meeting, as heretofore, two papers by women were given as part of Thursday's regular programme. Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper spoke on "The Pews in Relation to the Pulpit"; and she gave so much sound advice and so many suggestions to the pulpit, as well as to the pews, that there has been a request from many of the ministers and others present that the paper should be printed as a tract. Mrs. Hooper was followed by Mrs. A. Wendell Jackson, who gave a suggestive essay on "What our Young People can do for the Church." "The Church as an Educational Institution" was treated by Rev. E. M. Fairchild of Troy. His paper was an earnest and eloquent plea for a church modelled somewhat after the university pattern, with graded courses of instruction in ethics and religion. He contended that the old model on which the Unitarian Church was organized has become obsolete. While its spirit is undogmatic, its form is dogmatic, and does not fit the liberal tendency of the age. It should cease to be a propagandist Church, and become, instead, simply a school for instruction in ethics and religion. Rev. Theodore C. Williams, who led the discussion on Mr. Fairchild's paper, said that the essayist's position was radically inconsistent. If the Church is not to stand for and proclaim the truth, then why make a tremendous educational effort to arrive at the truth? As to the scheme for making the Church a university, the Lord help us if our faith and religion are to be only an academic extract from courses in ethics and philosophy! Rev. W. I. Nichols, who followed Mr. Williams, discussed the papers by Mrs. Hooper and Mrs. Jackson. In both, he said, the central thought had been the supreme importance of unselfishness. The church, he contended, that is truest to the spirit of unselfishness in all its worship, work, and social life, will grow and win the masses to it; while the church that is dominated by a spirit of selfishness, that makes self-interest its first concern, is sure to become exclusive, and so lose its hold upon the masses.

As was expected, the Thursday afternoon meeting proved to be one of the most interesting in the whole series. The programme consisted of personal testimonies from Rev. J. M. Scott, formerly a Baptist, Rev. Dr. Brundage, formerly a Methodist, Rev. S. R. Calthrop, formerly an Episcopalian, and Rev. A. H. Grant, formerly a Presbyterian, as to how they came out of Orthodoxy, and how they hope to lead others out. In the evening a second platform meeting was held, at which there were four addresses on the general subject "The Mission of the Unitarian Church to the Local Community." Rev. Edward Hale of Orange, N.J., was the first speaker. He said that the mission of the Unitarian Church was indicated by the fact that we stand free as regards our thought of God, the Bible, Jesus, and human life; and in this freedom we are to lead in the movement for a forward-looking and progressive religion. Rev. Charles E. St. John, speaking on the second topic, said that, although our beliefs are unwritten, and therefore modifiable, they are practical in their bearing upon life and conduct. Our conceptions of God, of man, of character, and of heaven, are all practical truths that can and should guide us to live as Jesus did. Mr. John Harsen Rhoades of New York spoke on the duty of the Unitarian Church to promote good citizenship. He defined good citizenship as obedience to law, reverence for religion, honesty, sobriety, and devotion to the highest social interests. Our service to the church and the world requires us to help in all practical ways in educating men to be good citizens. Rev. George Batchelor, in speaking on the fourth topic, said the task of those believing in God and humanity is to take the intrinsically divine element in men, women, and children, and raise it to command. In so doing, we do not turn our backs on God, on Jesus, or the Bible. No: these inspire and encourage us.

Mr. Batchelor's address brought to a close a very interesting and successful meeting of the Conference. D. W. M.

THE "NEW WORLD."

THE GUARANTEE FUND.

The New World is a quarterly theological review. It had its origin at a large meeting of ministers in Anniversary Week. Their proposal was laid before the National Conference; and its committee appointed the present editorial board, Dean C. C. Everett and Prof. C. H. Toy of Harvard Divinity School and President Orello Cone of Buchtel College, Ohio, Prof. N. P. Gilman of Meadville being the managing editor. With the exception of a small salary paid to the last-named, the editors receive no compensation. The review is published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. at $3 a year.

The aim of the New World is to represent the latest and best result of theological thought and learning in Europe as well as in America, and from liberal scholars of all denominations. How well this aim has succeeded can best be seen in the tables of contents of the fifteen numbers already issued. They have contained articles by Wellhausen and Holtzmann of Germany, Réville and Darmesteter of Paris, Menzies of Edinburgh, De Saussure of Amsterdam, Bosanquet of Oxford, Bann of Florence, and others; while among the American contributors have been President Andrews (Baptist), Bascom, Paine, Moxom, and Munger (Congregationalists), A. V. G. Allen, J. P. Peters and S. D. McConnell (Episcopalians), Kirkus (Presbyterian), Cone and Alcott (Universalists), and Everett, Chadwick, Savage, Allen, Dole, Slicer, and many others of the Unitarians. Besides the main articles every number contains between twenty and thirty reviews of important books by the above scholars and many others. It is confidently claimed that no review, at least in the English-speaking world, is doing so valuable work for liberal thought and scholarship. The Christian Union declared that the New World has taken "a place at once in the front rank of periodical literature,—a place where it may be said to fill a void." A prominent Episcopalian scholar, himself a contributor, has repeatedly said that it is the only place where independent articles of any denomination can appear, while a well-known Congregationalist is so interested that he refused to take payment for a very valuable article. To this it may be added that the New World has an even larger circulation among evangelical than among liberal ministers.

Now, no such review can hope to support itself upon its circulation, at least in its earliest years. The Conference of 1894 appointed a committee to raise an endowment fund of $50,000, which would have placed the review upon a permanent basis; but, in view of the many calls just now for other purposes, it has been decided to raise instead a guarantee fund of $20,000, of which no more than fifteen per cent. shall be called for, and nothing till the whole amount subscribed shall reach $10,000. About $7,000 has been easily obtained, and the rest is confidently expected. With this fund it will be possible to secure the best contributors, and to bring the review by judicious advertising to the notice of its natural constituency. The subscriptions already obtained are given below, and those which follow will be acknowledged in the same way. The trustees of the fund are Messrs. E. B. Haskell, F. C. Lowell, and N. P. Gilman.

E. B. Haskell.....	$1,000
A. T. Lyman.....	1,000
Miss A. P. Rogers.....	500
N. P. Gilman.....	500
Geo. H. Edwards.....	500
Dorman B. Eaton.....	500
Rev. J. W. Chadwick.....	150
Rev. H. N. Brown.....	100
Rev. W. H. Lyon.....	100
Rev. M. J. Savage.....	100
Rev. John Cuckson.....	100

Rev. A. S. Garver.....	$100
Rev. C. C. Everett.....	100
Rev. C. H. Toy.....	100
Rev. F. G. Peabody.....	100
Rev. C. A. Bartol.....	100
Rev. J. P. Forbes.....	100
Rev. T. R. Slicer.....	100
Rev. T. S. Moxom, D.D.....	100
F. C. Lowell.....	100
Prof. J. B. Thayer.....	100
Mrs. S. E. Hooper.....	100
Mrs. H. P. Kidder.....	100
Mrs. M. L. Clarke.....	100
Mrs. W. H. Lyon.....	100
Mrs. Longstreth.....	100
Mrs. J. F. Osgood.....	100
Miss Helen Collamore.....	100
J. B. Moore.....	100
W. B. Weeden.....	100
Enoch Lewis.....	100
G. B. Leverett.....	100
E. W. Clarke.....	100
E. L. Lovett.....	100
B. M. Jones.....	100
J. M. Little.....	100
M. E. Buttrick.....	100
A. Buttrick.....	100
J. E. Hudson.....	100
C. F. Dunbar.....	100

WILLIAM H. LYON, Secretary,
519 Beacon Street, Boston.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

Three new books have been placed on our tables since the last issue of the Register, as follows: "Ruling Ideas of the Present Age," by Washington Gladden. This is the essay that was awarded the prize by the trustees of Dartmouth College that is given every two years from the income of the "Richard Fletcher Fund," a book of 299 pages. Price 94 cents, net. "College Sermons," by the late Benjamin Jowett, M.A., Master of Balliol College, edited by Dean Fremantle,—twenty sermons on a great variety of subjects. 348 pages. Price $1.50, net. A pamphlet, the proceedings of the fifty-second regular meeting of the Philosophical Union of the University of California, giving in full an address by Prof. Josiah Royce, Ph.D., of Harvard University, on "The Conception of God," together with comments thereon by Dr. Sidney Edward Mezes of the University of Texas, Dr. Joseph Le Conte, and Dr. G. H. Howison of the University of California,—a valuable publication of 84 pages. Price 50 cents, net.

This building is a busy place nowadays, the committee-rooms are used daily, and the business of the various offices is brisk. And still we ought to do a great deal more business for our friends at a distance; and, now that the holidays are approaching, we trust our Unitarian friends that propose to remember their friends, their ministers, and their families with gifts of books, will send their orders to us. We can send you catalogues if you so desire, and shall be glad to do so.

FINANCES.

Not much to be said about finances that is very encouraging. The treasurer is afraid that too many people are expecting other people to do their duty. It was Artemas Ward, I believe, that during the Civil War was willing that all his wife's male relatives should enlist, and die, if necessary, for their country. And so it appears now to be probable that we have many Unitarians that are willing other Unitarians should give their money for the missionary work. There is no doubt any longer about one thing; and that is that indifference and apathy, not of the churches as churches, but of individual Unitarians, is the great danger that threatens our future.

VISITS.

Sunday, November 17, in the morning at the old First Church, or "Church of the Saviour," in Brooklyn, N.Y., one of the most active and influential churches outside New England. This church carries on an extensive missionary work of its own in Willow Place Chapel and other places. It is a staunch and faithful church that uniformly does its duty in a way that other churches may well imitate. Sunday evening at the "Aurora Grata Cathedral,"—a place with an imposing name, having, we believe, a Masonic signification. The place itself is a church edifice with a seating capacity of about one thousand or twelve hundred. This was filled that evening, and people standing everywhere they could find room. This was the third meeting of the "Forward Movement," or, to put it in old-fashioned phrase, a Unitarian revival meeting. All the meetings were crowded. It seems certain that they must do our cause good. These meetings might be held in many cities and towns in New England, and elsewhere, too, with good effect. The American Unitarian Association backed these meetings with help, and will do the same with other localities if our friends will give us the means to do it. It is difficult to find any work that pays better than this. The spoken word, and then the tract. It is as important to revive our work when we have churches as it is to found new churches. We shall get better crops if we cultivate our fields. Tuesday evening, November 19, Middle States Conference opened, and continued two days, closing with a platform meeting Thursday evening. The meetings were held in the First Church in Brooklyn, and were well attended throughout. No doubt the Register will contain a full account of the proceedings. Sunday, November 24, in the morning in the old church at Fitchburg, Mass., a healthy and prosperous church, doing good, steady work, with a good Sunday-school, and therefore a future before it that can be viewed with equanimity and confidence. In the evening of same day a union meeting of the two churches at Athol, Mass., a vigorous and active manufacturing town. The Unitarians in this town need not be ashamed of the record they have made and are still making as citizens, as well as Unitarians. The churches are doing good work, and we hope to see this town a model for others in public spirit and devotion to the Church we all believe in.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

The Sunday School.

The usual Channing Hall "Talk" will be held next Saturday, November 30, at 25 Beacon Street, at 2.30 o'clock, conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. The subject will be Lesson XII., "The Shepherd and his Flock." All cordially invited.

Those Sunday-schools wishing a stereopticon, or magic-lantern outfit, for illustrating lessons and similar purposes, can obtain a great deal of information by writing to A. W. Muclow, 244 Washington Street, Boston. Such equipment can be secured on instalment payments.

At Hudson, Mass., the "New Song and Service Book" has been made to serve quite a revival of interest. It has not only been vigorously introduced into the Sunday-school; but it has also been adopted for the Sunday evening popular meeting in the church, and meets well the demands upon it. Any information with regard to the use of it in both directions will be furnished by Mr. Caleb L. Brigham, who is one of our most intelligent and successful Sunday-school workers.

The Western Sunday School Society is publishing for the winter's course a series of lessons by Rev. W. C. Gannett on "The Flowering of Christianity." This is the completion of the six years' course. Mr. Gannett's work is always most suggestive and helpful. His essay at Washington was one of the conspicuous features, and the heart of it was the masterly way in which he interpreted and harmonized different elements. This quality of an interpreter and a reconciler is carried into his lessons. Rev. A. W. Gould, secretary of the Western Sunday School Society, is also furnishing a course called "Nature Studies," consisting of a four-page leaflet, illustrated, and quite attractive. Their chief use for most of our Sunday-schools would be as a supplementary aid to some more strictly religious line of subjects, illustrating and enforcing the ideas. These lessons are written in Mr. Gould's well-known clear and sympathetic style.

Rev. W. G. Eliot, Jr., is developing the possibilities of his Sunday-school in the First Unitarian Church at San Francisco in all directions. Among several happy helps, he has a printed form which serves as a "Notice of absent pupils." It also contains suggestions to teachers. These slips can be obtained from Mr. Eliot at a low rate. The Unitarian Sunday School Society has a few samples which can be had on request. Mr. Eliot sends out, at the beginning of each winter session, a circular addressed personally to each member of the Sunday-school, containing a friendly word and some happy suggestions. He also has from time to time a conference of the superintendent with the parents and guardians of the pupils of the school. This is the only way in which the much-discussed department of the Sunday-school can be made successful; namely, by earnest and intelligent work. When this zeal and planning are put into the Sunday-school, it flourishes.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—The second meeting of this Union was held, as usual, in the Church of the Disciples on the third Monday of November. After the social half-hour and the supper Mr. Frank B. Thayer, the president, introduced Rev. S. H. Roblin of the Second Universalist Church of Boston, whose subject was "Place and Function of the Sunday-school in Church Life." Its place, he believes, is to be an auxiliary of the church in Christianizing mankind. Its functions are to teach and to develop character. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells next spoke upon "The Place of Doctrine and Morals in Sunday-school Instruction." Mrs. Wells considers a knowledge of psychology, methodology, and school economy as requisites for the highest success in Sunday-school teaching,—in other words, that the teacher should understand the working of the child's mind, should be familiar with the best methods of training that mind, and should know how to adapt the methods to the needs of the school in which he is placed. There was some little time for discussion from the floor; and Rev. Richmond Fisk, Mrs. Clara A. Beatley, Mr. Robert C. Metcalf, and Rev. Edward A. Horton engaged in it.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

MIDDLESEX ALLIANCE.—The regular monthly meeting of the South Middlesex Branches of the Women's Alliance will be held at the Unitarian Building on Thursday, December 5, at twelve o'clock.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE.—The regular monthly meeting of the Suffolk Branches of the National Alliance of Unitarian Women will be held at 25 Beacon Street on Monday, December 2, at eleven o'clock. Officers of other Branches are cordially invited.

BOSTON.—Church of the Unity: Rev. Robert Collyer will preach next Sunday. Service begins promptly at 10.30 A.M.

King's Chapel: Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., will conduct the Wednesday noon service on December 4, commencing promptly at twelve o'clock, and continuing thirty minutes.

Ministers' Monday Club, December 2, 10.30 A.M.: Rev. W. H. Savary will preside. Rev. Dr. G. D. Herron of Iowa College will give the address on "Applied Christianity." The public invited.

Arlington Street Church: The "Charity Lecture," for one hundred and seventy years a conspicuous feature of the Boston charities, will be given at the Arlington Street Church on Sunday afternoon next by Rev. John Cuckson, the pastor, in connection with his vesper service. J. Capen, Secretary.

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): The third discourse in the Sunday evening services will be given December 1, at 7.30 o'clock, by Rev. Stopford W. Brooke. Subject, "Marching Orders from God." Special music by Mrs. L. M. Bartlett, soprano, Mr. L. M. Bartlett, tenor, and Mr. E. M. Goldstein, violinist. Mr. Howard M. Dow, organist. All seats free, and a welcome to all.

ATHOL, MASS.—Second Church: Every Saturday evening one of the young men of the Second Church visits the hotels, and, after learning the names of the strangers that are to be in town over Sunday, directs an envelope to each one of them, which contains an invitation to attend church. In this way the pastor made the acquaintance of a young man from Plattsburg, N.Y., the other Sunday, who, because of the invitation, attended the Unitarian church. It was the first time he had ever been in a Unitarian church or heard a Unitarian sermon. He expressed himself as much pleased with the service, and said that hereafter he should make it a point to attend the Unitarian church service wherever he could.

BELMONT, MASS.—Last Sunday, at the Unitarian church, Dr. Alfred Worcester assisted the pastor in presenting the claims of the Waltham hospital. A collection amounting to $165 was taken up at the close of the service. At the Sunday-school on the same day an offering of fruit, jelly, vegetables, etc., more than filling two barrels, were presented to the Parker Memorial in Boston for its Thanksgiving dinner.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Dr. William Everett of Quincy will preach in the First Parish Church on Sunday next, December 1.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—The Association of Ministers in and about Cambridge will meet with Rev. W. H. Johnson on Monday, December 2, in the vestry of the Austin Street Unitarian Church, between Essex and Norfolk Streets, Cambridgeport. Collocation at one o'clock. Essay at 2 P.M. Subject, "Ultimate Protestantism." Hilary Bygrave, Scribe.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.—A correspondent writes: "All Souls' Church is rejoicing in the prospect of having Rev. Leslie W. Sprague, as well as his wife, Rev. Lila Frost Sprague, for the month of December, at least. Mr. and Mrs. Sprague hesitate to accept the call extended them, and, anxious to discover the field of usefulness and prospects of growth open to the church, are to spend December in testing the material. They will not as yet place themselves under obligation beyond that. The society is showing decided activity; and more money has been raised at this canvas, under the stimulus of seeing Mr. and Mrs. Sprague, than has been secured for several years back. The good work shall go on."

NEW YORK.—The Unitarian Club of New York held its first meeting this season at the St. Denis Hotel on Friday evening, November 22. The president, Hon. John A. Taylor, was in the chair. The club was fortunate in having secured, among other speakers, several of the ministers who had taken part in the meetings of the Middle States Conference, which closed its sessions the night before. The general subject for consideration was "Our New Creed"; and the first and principal address was made by Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge, Mass. Mr. Crothers warned us against the danger of looking upon the Saratoga declaration as a finality; for, if it were so accepted, there would be an end to our religious development. We must beware of giving our loyalty to a person or an institution rather than to principles and ideals. The former arrests progress: the latter promotes it. Better the differences and controversies that marked our history before the Saratoga Conference than a peace that results in stagnation. The president then called on Rev. Joseph May of Philadelphia, who showed his hearty sympathy with Mr. Crothers's position by continuing in the same general line of thought. He did not think that our entire agreement in opinions, resulting in an absence of controversial discussion in our conferences and clubs, was at all desirable. He further urged an absolute sincerity on the part of all our ministers in making their phraseology, when speaking of Jesus, agree with their convictions as to his simple humanity. Rev. George Batchelor, who spoke next, said that he did not share the fears of the last speaker that perfect concord of opinion among ourselves was likely to destroy all opportunity for controversy. Those who enjoyed that sort of thing could have all the enjoyment of that kind they wanted if they would only improve the opportunity for contending for the truth which was afforded them in the truth-opposing attitude of the orthodox sectarians by whom they were surrounded. Mr. Batchelor closed by reminding his hearers that what the Saratoga action called for on our part was not loyalty to a person or an institution, but to a religion the principles and ideals of which are an inspiration to progress. Rev. S. R. Calthrop of Syracuse followed with a characteristically clear, eloquent, and forcible address, which he concluded by showing that, to fulfil its perfect work in us, our religion must develop the possible Jesus that is in every human soul.

The president of the Philadelphia Unitarian Club, being present, was called upon, and responded by giving the hearty greetings of his club. The last speaker was Rev. John M. Scott of Ithaca. His address was full of the poetry and grace of expression which marked his addresses before the Middle States Conference. Mr. Scott saw in the unanimity with which our Saratoga affirmation was made and accepted no reason to expect that we should fall into a state of self-satisfied indifference. He looked upon it as a fortunate circumstance that there was no longer occasion for wasting time in controversies among ourselves, for now we are made free to work together as a united band in waging that warfare which makes for human progress. In this work we shall find plenty of occasions for controversy; but let it be with the opponents of the world's welfare, and not among ourselves. Mr. Scott's address brought to a close one of the most enjoyable meetings the club has ever held.

POMONA, CAL.—Services were resumed October 1 with new zest. The minister has just completed a series of sermons entitled "An Honest Man," the different subjects being "An Honest Man in Religion," "An Honest Man in Society," "An Honest Man in the State." Services are well attended.

SALEM, ORE.—Our church is in a flourishing condition, the Unity Club, under our pastor, Rev. W. E. Copeland, is doing good work in Shakspeare, and the Ladies' Auxiliary, with Mrs. William England at the head, is making extensive preparations for an entertainment on Thanksgiving night. Our Sunday-school, with Mrs. W. E. Copeland as superintendent, is doing good work. On Sunday, November 10, Rev. Stanley M. Hunter, late of Salt Lake City, preached most acceptable sermons morning and evening. He also delivered a course of lectures on "Phrenology" in Channing Hall. Mr. Copeland preached at Eugene November 10. He is in hopes soon to be able, with the generous support of the American Unitarian Association, to establish a strong Unitarian society in that university town.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—First Church: Dr. Stebbins has fully regained his strength, and has preached with great vigor and power during all the month. Mrs. Booth's address to the Channing Auxiliary aroused a good deal of admiration for her and sympathy in the work she described.

ST. PAUL, MINN.—The Young People's Guild of Unity Church have printed a programme which gives the topics of their meetings from October 27 to May, together with the names of the leaders. The pastor, Rev. William R. Lord, announces a series of lectures on the following subjects: "Scientism," "Christian Science," "Spiritism," "Theosophy."

WORCESTER LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—The November meeting of the league was held on Wednesday, November 20, at the Church of the Unity, Worcester. The subject of the day was "Our City Schools"; and so great was the interest that about one hundred and forty women gathered to hear the papers and take part in the discussions. The morning session opened at eleven o'clock; and Miss Mary Trumbull of the English High School gave an entertaining description of the University Convocation held at Albany, and the National Educational Association meeting at Denver, combining both under the subject of "Educational Gleanings of a Summer." "Co-operation between Parents and Teachers" was discussed in two papers,—one from the standpoint of the parent, by Mrs. Nathaniel Seaver, and the other from the standpoint of the teacher, by Miss Lydia W. Ball.

Adjournment for luncheon came at noon. The first paper of the afternoon was on "The Health Conditions of the Schools," by Mrs. Everett H. Warren, followed by Mrs. Emma E. Foster, who discussed the question of "The Curriculum: Does it include the Proper Studies, and give them the Proper Perspective?" Mrs. Foster gave prominence to the thought that education is not simply to get information, but to form character. Mrs. Harriet G. Waite, principal of the Freeland Street School, came by invitation, bringing with her examples of the real work done in language study in the third and ninth grades in her own building. It was voted to send to the church at Somerville, over which Rev. Mary T. Whitney, a former president of the league, is settled, $10 as a contribution to the fair to be held early in December. At four o'clock the meeting adjourned.

High hearts are never long without hearing some new call, some distant clarion of God, even in their dreams; and soon they are observed to break up the camp of ease, and start on some fresh march of faithful service.—J. Martineau.

Wrong, though its title-deeds go back to the days of Sodom, is by nature a thing of yesterday; while the right, of which we became conscious but an hour ago, is more ancient than the stars, and of the essence of heaven.—James Russell Lowell.

Business Notices.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are a simple and convenient remedy for Bronchial Affections and Coughs. Carry them in your pocket. Sold only in boxes.

1500-1600, A.D.—All the antique furniture which is most valuable was built before mahogany was introduced into England. Oak was then the wood, and its dark color to-day is the natural result of three hundred years of use. The cabinet work which the Paine Furniture Company, on Canal Street, sell as Flemish Oak is a very exact imitation of this old English oak.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Boston, 19th inst., by Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Edward H. Houghton and Helen R. Cushing, both of Boston.
In Dorchester, 19th inst., in the Richmond Street Unitarian church, by Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge, Benjamin M. Greely and Helen P. Folsom, both of Dorchester.

Religious Notices.

THE address of Rev. O. K. Crosby is Yarmouth, Me.

THE address of Rev. Herman Haugerud is 1328 9th Street, South, Minneapolis, Minn.

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

GLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE GENUINE DUCHESS,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,
SOLE AGENTS,
WINTER ST., BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

For the Christian Register.
"VEXILLA REGIS PRODEUNT."

BY REV. EDWARD RANDALL KNOWLES, LL.D.

"Behold, a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment."
 "And the Redeemer shall come to Zion."
 "Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

"The banners of the King progress,"
 Thus sang the Church in ages past;
 And now the Right demands redress,
 And Truth asserts its power at last,
 Whilst Armageddon's thunders bring
 Forewarnings of the coming King.

Great Brahma's truth lacks Love Divine;
 Lord Buddha's precepts fail to bless;
 And, where the Moslem powers decline,
 The crescent wanes to nothingness.
 Love, mercy, holiness, demand
 Zion's sceptre for Messiah's hand.

The Christian lands reject their God,
 His justice is no longer feared;
 For Mammon's sway is now adored
 Where once the Saviour was revered.
 No lordly champions proudly claim
 To wear the cross in Jesus' name.

Yet soon the banners of the King
 Shall grandly wave o'er Zion's wall,
 As 'neath Messiah's ordering
 The cross and crescent both shall fall;
 And, whilst all wrongs obtain redress,
 A King shall reign in righteousness.

Sermon Gleanings.

THE HARVEST.

BY W. C. GANNETT.

What is a harvest season? It is death, but a fruition. It is stripped fields, but barrelled apples; stubble in the field, but wheat at the mill; out-of-doors a naked world, the summer things all gone, empty nests clinging to the boughs, brown leaves swinging their last hour in the wind or rustling crisply under foot; and, indoors, thanksgiving for the populations saved again, and for glad homes nestling closer.

Fruition and a death. That does not mean success becoming failure then. The dying is part of the success. The loyal leaves,—they would resent a funeral sermon preached or dirges sung above them. Their very last word, their death-murmur, is Life. "We have not been destroyed," they say. "We have been fulfilled in fruit that we have made. In it we have eternal life."

It is the secret of all God's harvest fields, the way in which he hoards the gains of all his work from waste. It is the miracle within the miracle of snow and resurrection and flowers. Thanks to the Harvest-secret we need not mourn for anything as lost, perhaps need mourn for nothing as wholly vanished. The trials, the disappointments, the wane of friendships, the temptations that are hardly put under foot, are leaves which the seasons bring and the seasons take away. To no purpose? Nay: they give us the new preciousness of ourselves, our strength of spiritual fibre, our wiser philosophy of life, the beautiful lines on the face, the quiet cheer in the heart, and our increasing helpfulness.

In us all and through all life the secret of the harvest is the same. The laws of the seasons reign in us. "Herein is the Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." Either by doing or by bearing we must act in order to harvest anything. Action is to thought and feeling what the leaf is to the crude sap: then of action habit is the blossom, and of habit character is the fruit. Character is the concentrated result of life, its organized deposit, its harvest in us, and the seed of after-life.

THANKSGIVING.

BY CHARLES G. AMES.

"This is the day which the Lord hath made: we will rejoice and be glad in it."

We often talk—perhaps we often feel—as if there were no sanctity or divinity where we are, as if our own time were profane and vulgar, or merely secular, as if the glory of the Lord were far off in space or withdrawn from the passing hours, as if we were dwelling in a world forsaken and forgotten. But why need we look backward through the centuries or forward to some final consummation for the age of gold? Why need we climb the heights or descend into the depths to find the dwelling-place of the Spirit that fills the universe? Why need we cross the seas to ask leave of the Turks to visit the Holy Land? The throne that is high and white is set up in every atom and in every conscience. The place where we stand is holy ground. And this is the day which the Lord hath made. Shall we not rejoice and be glad?

One must often repeat words used by Lessing more than a hundred years ago, "This is not an enlightened age: it is an age becoming enlightened." On every side there is a mingling of light with darkness, of good with evil. On every side the conflict of elements and the confused noise of battle. There is not a truth spoken but somebody contradicts it, not a good thing attempted but somebody resists it, not a wrong but somebody defends it, not a folly nor an absurdity but somebody appears as its apostle, and finds converts and followers. All the more let us say, "This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes." For it is through these very processes of struggle that humanity makes its way. Not every change is an improvement: it is well that every proposed reform should be challenged and every argument sifted. All our mistakes are costly; but they are instructive, for we learn to walk by stumbling. And the wrangling of human selfishness, the clash of classes, like the quarrels of children, proves at last to be a school of social justice and brotherhood; for, when we find there is "no thoroughfare," we turn back to the King's highway.

Our duties to each other are coming to the front. The demand for an applied Christianity is sending creed, ceremony, and profession to the rear, to be looked after when man is a little surer of his fair footing on the planet. And the beauty of it is that all this is coming to be accepted as a divine leading, a new chapter in Genesis, a step in the long march of continuous creation,—the progressive incarnation of the life of God in the life of his human children. The new faith affirms that this is the day of the Lord, and these the years of his right hand.

Now we have found our deepest ground and largest reason for Thanksgiving. The earth is the home of God as truly as it is the home of man.

The low state of development in which mankind are found is not an absolute evil, and the spirits that have risen highest and become purest are only a little in advance of their brethren. The existence of all slow, sluggish, and inert creatures is the divine opportunity. They all come into the beautiful order when we associate them with the mighty forces that work continually for redemption.

Spiritual Life.

Thankfulness is the tune of angels.—Spenser.

God is pleased with no music below so much as the thanksgiving songs of rejoicing, comforted, and thankful persons.—Jeremy Taylor.

The law of the harvest is to reap more than you sow. Sow an act, and you reap a habit; sow a habit, and you reap a character; sow a character, and you reap a destiny.—George Dana Boardman.

He that hath so many causes of joy and so great is very much in love with sorrow and peevishness, who loses all these pleasures, and chooses to sit down on his little handful of thorns.—Jeremy Taylor.

We have had a precious inheritance in the old homes of New England. Our fathers builded better than they knew when they erected them; and he shall be the benefactor of his children who shall under altered circumstances of time and place transmit to his children a true home.—J. F. W. Ware.

The Jew is but a river, and humanity is the ocean. If we be faithful, we shall speed the time when Judaism will cast out narrowness, and Christianity cast out heathenism; and, reconciliation being established, the world will repeat the motto of the New Jew, "Truth is my creed: God is my guide."—Rabbi I. Leonard Levy.

Let us acknowledge the goodness which fills the earth with food, food for the body and food for the souls of God's creatures,—the glory of knowledge, the light of religion, the strength that comes in time of need, the faith and peace that follow sorrow. Oh, let us be filled with joyful thanksgiving, and all that is within us bless his holy name!—Selected.

MY CITADEL.

BY ESTHER B. TIFFANY.

Beleaguered in my citadel,
 My outer wall shows gap and breach.
 I feel the shock of shot and shell,
 But me they cannot reach.

Still flies my flag, for God is here.
 I grasp his standard in my hand.
 What should I know of craven fear
 Beneath his strong command!

He sends his legions forth each hour
 To build afresh my shattered wall,
 And angels from each clarion tower
 His ringing watchwords call.

Literature.

"THE POSTULATES OF REVELATION AND OF ETHICS."*

To those who had a personal acquaintance with Dr. Hill, and who knew how full to overflowing were his fountains of thought and intellectual activity, it was a surprise and disappointment that he published so little during his life. Profoundly versed as he was, not only in theology, but in physics, skilful with his brush, an expert in botany, a musician of taste, a successful inventor, and a distinguished mathematician and educator, he exhibited a versatility rarely seen in this day of specialists. The eminent offices he had filled as president, successively, of Antioch College and Harvard University, had given his word authority, and brought him into close personal acquaintance with the leading minds of his day. Men like Horace Mann, Louis Agassiz, Benjamin Peirce, and Prof. Wyman were numbered among his intimate and admiring friends.

It is fortunate, then, that we have at length a volume containing in permanent form the ripe fruit of his thought, as he gave it in his later years to the students of the Meadville Theological School. The reader who had the good fortune to become familiar with the series of articles which he published during his life on "The Natural Sources of Theology" and upon "Geometry and Faith" will probably find some things in the present volume reproduced, with but moderate changes of diction and illustration. But the undeservedly small circulation and temporary form, which was all that those learned and cogent papers obtained, and the fuller and final form here given to Dr. Hill's thought, entirely justify whatever repetition may be found in the present volume. Dr. Hill had an unusual equipment for dealing with the great questions he was so fond of discussing. For the remarkable scientific discoveries of modern days have made it necessary that the competent theologian should be much more than a theologian. He should also be well versed in those scientific laws and facts which have put so many religious issues in an entirely different aspect. The result of this has been that, in the usual lack of scientific knowledge among theologians, the men of science have been led to take up the rôle of theologic expounders; and, being oftentimes as unfamiliar with the principles of theism and philosophy as the theologians were with nature's laws,

*THE POSTULATES OF REVELATION AND OF ETHICS. By Thomas Hill, D.D., LL.D. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis.

the ipse dixit of these amateur theologians have been equally erratic. Dr. Hill, by rare good fortune, united in himself a first-hand knowledge, not only of the arsenal and weapons of faith, but of the methods of physics and the calculations of the mathematicians. His knowledge was exceptionally wide, accurate, and diversified, his judgment keen and positive, his spirit most devout, and his grasp of philosophic principles and the laws of nature were characterized by a comprehensiveness and firmness rarely to be found; and a careful reading of these weighty and richly freighted chapters fully confirms the judgment of the editor that "for intellectual strength, wealth, and variety of acquisitions, and the vigor and justness of his thought, Dr. Hill had very few equals and fewer superiors among the men of his time." The fresh and solid arguments which he was thus able to supply in maintenance of faith in an intelligent and guiding Wisdom informing Nature are notable contributions to modern thought. Attention should especially be given to the noble chapters on "The Unseen Real," "The Infinite Knowable," "The Universe a Work of Art," "Beauty," and "Relativity and Reality." By illustration upon illustration, drawn from his rich storehouse of scientific facts, he shows the fallacy of the scepticism, lately so common, as to the validity of human knowledge, and inspires his readers with a trust not only in the visible and tangible phenomena of the world, but in the unseen and intangible Real that lies behind it, as its basis and condition. Dr. Hill saw in the universe a constant revelation of the great First Cause from which it had proceeded,—a Cause that cannot rationally be looked upon as other than intelligent, good, and personal. In the human mind—unquestionably the loftiest product of the Creative Power—Dr. Hill discerned the surest key to the nature of that Power. It is only through will that we have any direct knowledge of the force that forms the activity of the universe. The intellect of man, with its unwillingness to stop its flight of thought at any limit short of the Infinite and the Self-existent; the heart of man, affirming that the divine nature cannot be lacking in that which forms the blessedness and glory of the human and which is most needed for man's daily support; the conscience, intuitively recognizing a Law-giver who impresses on the moral sense the law which is felt to be transcendent to the claims of life itself,—all these are natural sources of religious knowledge, deserving of our trust. The modern forms of scepticism, especially the fashionable agnosticism of the hour, stand, as Dr. Hill keenly shows, on unstable foundations. They are not scientific, but the reverse of that, a large part of them drawing their conclusions from logical fallacies, which, instead of reasoning up from the finite to the Infinite, as cautious thinkers do, rashly try to reason down from certain metaphysic concepts of an Infinite, left utterly indeterminate, to distrust of the rational and beneficent traits of the Universal Spirit, plainly manifested in the world and directly discerned by candid observers. Dr. Hill was a stout champion of teleology, and brings most convincing arguments and striking illustrations to support his position. His luminous presentation of the argument from design, and his

FLEMISH OAK.

If you care for artistic furniture, why not get the best? The finest creations to-day in the swell shops in New York and London are built in Flemish Oak, if for dining-room use.

We are the only furniture house in this city showing a large line of Flemish Oak dining-room cabinet work at low prices. Our prices for it are not more than sixty per cent. of the prices charged in New York.

The dark greenish-black ground makes a superb relief for metal trimmings. The ornamentation is greatly assisted by a large range of reproductions of old hinges, locks, and fittings in wrought iron, copper, and brass.

Flemish Oak furniture is just what is needed in rooms which have been painted in the late English art stains or upholstered in "Morris" or "Liberty" fabrics.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

sympathetic statement of the rational order and ideal plans that pervade the universe, lift this most persuasive of theistic pleas quite above the current aspersions of it as a mere "carpenter theory."

It is to be regretted, however, that Dr. Hill's early intimacy with Agassiz and loyalty to the views of his scientific friend should have led him to ignore or disparage as he did the memorable work of Charles Darwin in establishing the genetic development of species, and in tracing the influence of natural selection and sex selection in the development of life. Had Dr. Hill been able to enter more sympathetically into the labors of the scientific world during the last thirty years, he would have found this dreaded Saul, called Evolution, also among the prophets of God; and, in its ascending and orderly progress, he might have shown us still more forcible illustrations of the purposiveness that guides the movements of the world, and fresh demonstration that the Power that steadily generates this cosmic growth must be that which alone can grow,—a Life equal to the wondrous flower and fruit that its quickening sap from age to age produces. And in his system of ethics, also, Dr. Hill would have gained not a little if he had not looked with such aversion at the very shadow of evolution. For, instead of being the natural nurse and teacher of utilitarianism, as is so often thought, the steady index finger of Evolution points to a higher end than that of happiness,—to that loftier goal of the fullest possible development of the human faculties and the ideal perfection of our race.

Dr. Hill made no effort to dress his arguments with any of that brilliant rhetoric that lends such a fascination to the writings of our revered Nestor among English theologians, James Martineau. But his style has the merits most useful to the student and the reading public,—those of transparent lucidity and simplicity, a homespun vigor and directness, logical cogency and pregnant thought. There is no suspicion of padding, no need to puzzle over enigmas of fine phrase; and the autobiographic anecdotes and illustrations that abound give a personal spice and savor to the train of reasoning that is most agreeable. The editor does well to call attention to the fact that, like Dr. William B. Carpenter, James Martineau, and other leading defenders of the modern spiritual philosophy, Dr. Hill began his intellectual course as an advocate of necessity and utilitarianism, but, like these distinguished English thinkers, thought his way out to a diametrically opposite intellectual faith, earnest in his conviction of moral freedom and the sovereignty of duty. And there are not unjustly deduced from this encouraging auguries of a brighter day of rational conviction and religious trust. Prof. Barber has done his editorial work with commendable care and judiciousness; and the readers of this memorial volume will not only be grateful for these invaluable discussions of the deepest problems of our age and the forceful defences of pure theism and sound ethics that it preserves, but will be equally thankful for the glimpses of a sincere and earnest thinker, an untiring student of nature, and a pure and devoted Christian life, ever walking humbly before the face of God that it embalms for us. The book, in short, is one that every theological student and young minister of our day who, amid the "bubble, bubble, toil and trouble" of modern speculation, desires to keep a level head, ought to own and study.

JAMES T. BIXBY.

THE MOGUL EMPERORS OF HINDUSTAN. By Edward S. Holden, LL.D. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—The period covered by Prof. Holden's book is that extending from 1398 A.D. to 1707; and consequently his first emperor is Timur, better known as Tamerlane. But, in sober, historic truth, Timur did not found the Mogul Empire in India. He overran the country, and went back to Samarkand; but in 1525 Babar, the fifth in descent from Timur, and fifth Mohammedan conqueror, fired by the fame of Timur's conquest, invaded India, and set up a government which lasted in name until 1857, but entered on its long decline in 1707 with the death of Aurangzeb. Prof. Holden passes at a bound from Timur to Babar, and then to his successor, Humayun, whose successor was Akbar the Great, whose toleration of the most diverse creeds excited the admiration of Tennyson, and was made the subject of one of the last poems that he wrote, and which was published almost simultaneously with his death. Akbar's successor was Jahangir, after whom came the Empress Nur-Mahal, then Shah Jahan and Aurangzeb, the history of whose reaction and ruin, as written by Sir William Hunter, Prof. Holden introduces bodily into his book. It is a pity that his own chapters are not written in the agreeable manner of his borrowed one. He is not a literary artist, and his presentation of his matter is loose-jointed in the extreme. This effect, however, is produced in part by the introduction of extracts from native historians and sayings of the emperors that we could ill afford to spare. The fine sentiments of Timur weaken the argument against the Davidic authorship of the Psalms, based on their incongruity with David's personal character. Timur talked of his "pure soul," and built a pyramid of seventy thousand skulls. Akbar was a great ruler in every sense of the word, while yet it may be questioned whether his religious individualism did not detract something from the practical efficiency of his reign.

THE BEGINNINGS OF WRITING. By Walter James Hoffman, M.D., of the Bureau of American Ethnology, Smithsonian Institution. With an Introduction by Prof. Frederick Starr. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—The editor's introduction is very brief; and there is no good reason why its useful matter should not have been presented by Dr. Hoffman under his own hand, except as it reports the indefatigable zeal and energy of his investigations. At first the savage, trying to carry over the thought of to-day to the morrow, used quipus (knotted strings) and wampum belts, and such tangible reminders. Picture-writing came next, its pictures being always ideograms, representations of ideas. Next came the phonogram, which was the representation of a sound. Dr. Hoffman's monograph covers all these stages, especially as they were developed among North American tribes. These made much use of tangible reminders. They drew very expressive pictures, developing complicated systems of pictography equal to the exigencies of a continuous narrative; while some peoples of Mexico and Central America were passing from ideograms to phonograms,—a transition full of interest for the student and the general reader. Such a treatise would be futile without illustrations; and the book has a great abundance (one hundred and thirteen), some of which are in several parts. There is nothing engaging in the manner of the book. Its value consists wholly in its matter. Yet must one be very dull of heart not to find a certain pathos in this struggle to express man's early thoughts. Will they never know—these children of the dawn—how grateful we are to them for their patience, whereby we have profited so much?

TWO LITTLE PILGRIMS' PROGRESS. A Story of the City Beautiful. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—Mrs. Burnett's latest juvenile is in her best vein, and both for interest and fine feeling may be placed beside "Little Lord Fauntleroy." The story centres around two children,—Meg and Robin,—who were twins and orphans, and were taken in charge by their aunt, a woman of unusual energy and practical faculty. She was the devotee of thrift and industry, and her life was prosaic in the utmost degree. Her mind was narrowed by her farm, which absorbed her entire thoughts. The children, on the other hand, were highly imaginative, and lived in an ideal world. Left alone to care for themselves, they spent most of their time in a "straw parlor" in the barn. Here they lived in a world of their own. On hearing the men of the farm talking of the Chicago Fair, their imagination was intensely excited about it. They read with avidity everything they could pick up from the newspapers, until at last they hit upon the plan to earn and save money to go in search of the wonders of the "City Beautiful." With their bags in hand and a meagre purse, they left at night, unknown to their aunt, but rich in faith, trust, and hope. The story of their trip, their meeting with John Holt, their devotion to Ben, and other incidents are given with that grace and exquisite feeling which mark Mrs. Burnett's juvenile stories. The way in which the children walked in fairyland, as told by Meg, throws an ideal brightness over the lives of the twins. The readers of Mrs. Burnett will hail with pleasure this new story, which is all alive with the touches of moral beauty and heroism, and full of a clear insight into the deepest and highest things in life.

THE LAST OF THE VIKINGS. A Book for Boys. By Capt. Charles Young. With illustrations by J. Williamson. London: George Bell & Sons.—The aim of the author in this work is to make a fairly accurate historical romance by filling up here and there, at his own risk, such gaps in his hero's career as cannot be satisfactorily accounted for in history. The style is exaggerated, and the descriptions are overdrawn. Still, the book will be read with excited interest by boys, because it deals with thrilling incidents and personal exploits. The hero sketched is Harold Hardrada, who, through a marvellous career and by great force of character, reached the throne of Norway. He was the last of that race who, in the early history of Northern Europe, made war their business, and were simply roving pirates, who, by their personal prowess, manly strength, and dauntless courage, seized what of land or treasure they could lay their hands on. In their age they were a terror, and spread desolation and death along their track. The career of Harold has all the features of romance. His portrait as warrior, pilgrim, poet, monarch, is drawn with an exaggeration deeply colored with the marvellous. It was a period of "blood and iron," and some of the descriptions of slaughter in battle are so graphic and vivid as to be harrowing. We have in this historical romance a picture of society and men in very striking contrast to our own industrial age.

THE STARK MUNRO LETTERS. Edited and arranged by A. Conan Doyle, author of "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes," etc. With Illustrations. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—Those who like the kind of thing which Dr. Doyle has given us in "Sherlock Holmes" and "Round the Red Lamp" will be disappointed with these "Letters," if they go to them expecting the same kind of things they found in those books. Others—and Wisdom will be justified of her children in the event—will prefer this book to the others. It is weak where they are strong. As a story, it is poorly conceived. Dr. Doyle was apparently seeking a vehicle for the transmission of his ideas on theological and religious subjects. He did not care to make us a present of his opinions in a theological treatise, preferring to make hay while the sun of popular favor is shining out of any grass that grows upon his land. His opinions, if not always valuable, are often interesting. The author is extremely versatile; and on pages 113-116 he has given us a poem called "With Either Hand," which is a notable contribution to the literature of pessimism, or, rather, to the indifference which finds the Eternal Powers about equally good and evil. No doubt we may expect a volume of poetry from Dr. Doyle mainly in this line before long.

THE CHRONICLES OF COUNT ANTONIO. By Anthony Hope, author of "The Prisoner of Zenda," etc. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—Since "The Prisoner of Zenda" Mr. Hope has given us nothing so pleasant and agreeable as these "Chronicles." Some of his intervening things may have been as bright or brighter, but they were more or less off the color. Some may object that the color of this one is too red, as if the author were trying to make up the loss of blood and slaughter consequent on the demise of Mr. Stevenson. It is a story of the merry green-wood, and the audience which has for generations applauded the doings of Robin Hood and his merry men can be relied upon to give it a cordial reception. A story makes its impression by its dominant trait, and that in this case is the nobility of the outlaw. Should it fall into the hands of any rich men who have time to read a book, it will probably make them wonder if they would not prefer to be robbed in Count Antonio's simple and straightforward manner than by the legislator, the lobbyist, and the walking delegate.

AGAINST HUMAN NATURE. By Maria Louise Pool. New York: Harper's. $1.25.—Miss Pool is one of those writers who, like Mary Wilkins and Alice Brown, delight in the study of humble types of character, developed amid narrow surroundings; and, although her work is far less artistic and delicate than theirs, yet she usually succeeds in producing a novel that is interesting as a story and effective as a study. The New England spinster is reproduced here with her purity, her fidelity, and her unsophisticated wisdom; but the heroine is an emotional North Carolina girl, who becomes converted at a revival meeting, and marries the minister in order to help him save souls, ignoring the question of love. This is "against human nature"; but the husband and wife experience the vicissitudes and uncertainties of the usual love affair, only with the difference that they come after marriage instead of before. Miss Pool has approached bravely the difficult task of interesting her readers in a certain enthusiasm that seems to many hysterical and abnormal. If she has not entirely succeeded, the fault seems to be less that of treatment than of subject.

THE CHRISTIAN CONSCIOUSNESS: ITS RELATION TO EVOLUTION IN MORALS AND IN DOCTRINE. By J. D. Black. Boston: Lee & Shepard.—No term has been used more vaguely than that which Mr. Black has made the title of his book. If he had defined it clearly at the outset, his frequent use of it would have been much less baffling and irritating. But, as one goes, he finds that he has here another straw which tells which way the wind is blowing, and that it is not in the direction of the traditional Orthodoxy, or, if in that direction, with a volume and momentum that bode nothing good for the stability of venerable constructions. The book touches current problems at many points, and always in the interest of a more liberal interpretation of principles and a more humane devotion to the common good. The main contention is that the Christian consciousness is not something backward-looking, fixed, immovable, but something that allies itself with evolution, and makes for freedom, progress, and reform.

LITTLE RIVERS: A BOOK OF ESSAYS IN PROFITABLE IDLENESS. By Henry Van Dyke. Charles Scribner's Sons.—Dr. Van Dyke is not only a fisher of men, but a

How Longfellow
Wrote His Best-Known Poems

BY HEZEKIAH BUTTERWORTH

What led to the writing of "Hiawatha," "Excelsior," "A Psalm of Life," "Evangeline."
Told in the Christmas issue of

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
10 Cents: For Sale Everywhere
The Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia
COPYRIGHT, 1895 BY THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

fisher of fish, as Peter was before him; and the smell of fish may be caught from more than one chapter in this book. It is a very agreeable odor, at least in the delicate and charming way in which Dr. Van Dyke suggests it. But that is not the only odor in this volume, redolent with balsam, spear-mint, and pine boughs, and blossoming with heather, clover, gentian, and forget-me-nots. You may hear the note of the cuckoo, the song of the lark, and the white-throated sparrow. The author is a true lover of nature, and he easily kindles his enthusiasm in the reader. His ten essays in this volume take us to the Adirondacks, to Canada, to Switzerland and Scotland; and we delight to follow our genial guide. The book is beautifully illustrated, and will bring some of the best spirit of outdoor life into indoor leisure.

THE SECOND JUNGLE BOOK. By Rudyard Kipling. New York: The Century Company.—How eagerly a second "Jungle Book" will be welcomed! But we should do well to remember that there can be but one original "Jungle Book." The charm of novelty, which so greatly enhanced the interest of the first volume, is somewhat worn off in the second. We have a well-established friendship for Baloo and Bagheera; but their wisdom and skill are familiar, and we are inclined to share Mowgli's superiority. It is trying, too, to pick up the old threads, and find Shere Khan limping through the jungle, when we know already that his hide has been stretched on the Council Rock. There is a made-to-order flavor about some of the stories; but some of the old charm is in the "Spring Running," when "Man goes to Man at the Last," and we bid farewell to the "Little Brother," Mowgli.

SNOW-SHOES AND SLEDGES. By Kirk Munroe. Harper & Brothers. $1.25.—"The Fur Seal's Tooth," which was published about a year ago, left its anxious boy readers in a most unsatisfactory state of uncertainty as to the fate of its characters; and the present volume is necessary for an understanding of the outcome of Phil's search for his father. These adventures in arctic Alaska are as thrilling as ever, and the perils overcome are quite as great. The mysterious happenings that took the fur seal's tooth into most unexpected places show that its influence was not impaired by change. The book seems rather long drawn out, but that only makes the pleasure of reading it less brief. We cannot help feeling with this, as we often have before in considering the books of this writer, that he might do something a great deal better for the boys if he were willing to take the time for it.

A WHITE BABY. By James Welsh. New York and London: Frederick A. Stokes Company.—This little book is unique in subject-matter, as well as in treatment. An underlying faith in the Negro race is manifest; and, though the majority of the characters command little love or respect, Loo and Abram redeem the whole community of "Pine Open," and their idyllic love is a beautiful thing. The story of the interchange of babies is improbable enough, and the end is melodramatic in the extreme; but these, which are meant to be the main features, sink into insignificance beside the charming story of the black man's love for his white-souled wife and the triumph of his faith in her goodness and purity. These give a glory to the commonplace life, and make the book well worth reading.

THE COMING OF THEODORA. By Eliza Orne White. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.—One gladly recognizes here the author of "Miss Brooks." Theodora is one of Marcella's American cousins. With the best of intentions and the firmest will, she tries to make herself a useful member of her brother's household. The people of Edgecomb feel, however, that her fine powers of management are wasted in their quiet town; and Theodora finally finds her sphere in a college settlement. The charming brother and his sweet little wife and the lovable minister are very real characters. The jarring note is the little seven-year-old Essie, who interferes in a most effectual way with the plans of her elders. The types appeal particularly to Bostonians, and are distinctively of Miss White's creation.

MAID MARIAN AND CROCHET CASTLE. By Thomas Love Peacock. Illustrated by F. H. Townsend. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.25.—In this revival of Peacock we gladly welcome "Maid Marian," for with Robin Hood we meet ever willingly. The satire, the humor, and the merry songs give freshness to the familiar tale; and the artist has caught Peacock's very spirit. One cannot, however, expect "Crochet Castle" to become popular again. The long, wearisome conversations strung together with Peacock's usual disregard for plot, the endless discussions of the Anglicized Scotchman, Mr. Crotchet, and his specialist friends, Mr. Eavesdrop, Mr. Too-good, Mr. Chainmail, Rev. Dr. Folliot, and their ilk, are of but passing interest to-day. The introduction is by Mr. George Saintsbury.

PRIVATE TINKER. By John Strange Winter. New York: Frederick A. Stokes & Co.—These short stories are of the old-fashioned kind, such as used to appear regularly in Godey's Magazine, though they are higher in the order of merit than most of those productions. The short story of modern days is something more than a condensed novel which might with equal propriety be expanded into the conventional three volumes. These are written with the vivacity which readers have learned to expect from their writer; but they do not draw from those phases of English life in which she is most at home, and they fail to do justice to the cleverness which produced "Bootles's Baby" and one or two of her other garrison stories.

THE CROOKED STICK. By Rolf Boldrewood. Macmillan & Co. $1.25.—Rolf Boldrewood has repeatedly shown his ability to construct a good story, as most stories go; and his familiarity with Australian life lends itself effectively to their backgrounds and general atmosphere. Pollie, his colonial heroine, is a bright and winning girl, who goes through a small forest of lovers, and comes dangerously near picking up the crooked stick at last. She is saved in time by the letter of the woman to whom her lover is morally bound. There is no harm in betraying thus much of the plot, since the chief interest of the book is in its graphic pictures of Australian life. The weak point is in the ease with which Bertram gives up the fair heiress.

A JOLLY GOOD SUMMER. By Mary P. Wells Smith. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.25.—This is the seventh "jolly good" book that has appeared from the pen of this popular writer, and it seems to us decidedly one of the best of the series. Its natural tone and the genuineness of the characters give it an interest that requires no startling adventures. Children are always interested in the stories of other children whose lives are not unlike their own, and the book may be recommended from both the child's and the mother's point of view. Readers of the Register do not need to be reminded that the writer has been a favorite contributor to our own columns.

CHERRYFIELD HALL. By F. H. Balfour (Ross George Dering). New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.—This story is called an episode in the life of an adventurer; but "adventurer" is a harsh term to apply to the prying, meddling Miss Jorkaway, whose imagination interferes so disastrously with her lookout for the main chance. Fortunately, there is a younger and more attractive heroine in this unraveling of mysterious and romantic happenings. The story is less sombre than "Dr. Mirabel's Theory," by the same author; but the comedy element ought to be more artistically managed.

YAN AND NOCHIE. By M. Carrie Hyde. Roberts Brothers. 50 cents.—This is a story of Revolutionary times among the Dutch colonists on the Hudson River, and tells us how Jacob Van Tassel, after opposing the Tory freebooters with his great goose gun, was at last taken prisoner, and only rescued after much trouble and privation by clever Yan, the playmate of his little daughter, Nochie. It is a bright little story, in which Saint Nicholas acts as patron, protector, and comfort; and the book ends with a merry Christmas, when families are reunited after the war.

GOOSTIE. By M. Carrie Hyde. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 50 cents.—No subject for a story is more pathetic than that of little children left alone in a great city to take care of themselves. Brave Hans in this story provides for his little golden-haired brother by giving him away to people who love and care for him, while he himself takes the full burden of loneliness and poverty and struggle on his own shoulders. It comes out right in the end, however; and the two brothers are reunited after Hans has become a successful artist.

Ladies' Aid Societies.

In church work the women are always in front. Three-fourths of the churches of America would be speedily closed without their help. Yet they are often puzzled as to what new steps to take to make their special work bright and interesting. We suggest Lantern services. Don't be startled! Our Stereopticons are perfectly safe, easily operated, and are sold to Ladies' Aid Societies on easy instalments and slides rented.

Send for further particulars, and lantern literature, and get more light on the subject.

RILEY BROTHERS,

Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York. BOSTON 244 Washington St. CHICAGO 136 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.) 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND 411 Couch St.

MUSIC FOR CHOIRS

"Anthem Tribute"

By L. O. Emerson. Just published. A new anthem book of uncommon interest and excellence. The fifty-three compositions in the volume have been composed and selected for the especial use of amateur choirs, and will be found fluent, melodious, and impressive in a high degree. An attractive variety of theme and treatment is an especial feature. Boards, $1.00, Postpaid. Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

"McIntosh's Anthems"

A new collection of rare completeness and excellence. 110 pieces. Round or character notes. Boards, $1.00, Postpaid. Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

"Sunday Anthems"

By W. O. Perkins. Containing the latest choir music from the best sources. Boards, $1.00, Postpaid. Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

"Emerson's Easy Anthems"

Boards, 80 Cents, Postpaid. Per doz. $7.20, Not Postpaid.

"Trowbridge Collection"

A comprehensive collection of standard music. Boards, 75 Cents, Postpaid. Per doz. $6.75, Not Postpaid.

"Emerson's Choice Anthems"

Boards, $1.00, Postpaid. Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

"Gabriel's Anthems"

Boards, $1.00, Postpaid. Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

Full descriptive circulars of any book, on application. Correspondence solicited.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

GEORGE L. CHANEY'S BOOKS.

F. GRANT & CO.; OR, PARTNERSHIPS.

A Story for the Boys who mean Business. Illustrated. 16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

"To illustrate the perils and temptations that beset boys (or men) in partnership enterprises."—Unitarian Review.

TOM.

A Home Story. Illustrated. 16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

"The three boys, Tom, Dick, and Harry, are happy illustrations of the power of judicious and affectionate training."—Journal.

ALOHA.

Travels in the Sandwich Islands. With Illustrations and Map. 16mo. $1.50.

"The scenery, the people, the productions, and the grand results of missionary labors are told with such simplicity and enthusiasm that you almost seem to share the pleasure of his experiences."—Detroit Christian Adv.

EVERY-DAY LIFE AND EVERY-DAY MORALS.

16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

BELIEF.

16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

At all Bookstores. Mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, Publishers, Boston.

NEW GIFT BOOKS. THE CITY OF THE SULTANS.

Or Constantinople, the Sentinel of the Bosphorus. By Clara Erskine Clement. Handsomely illustrated with photographs from photographs.

A companion to the popular "ITALIAN CITIES," to which series the writer of the present volume contributed the "QUEEN OF THE ADRIATIC" and "NAPLES: THE CITY OF PARTHENOPE." Small 8vo, cloth. Elaborate cover. $3.00

THE SALON OF 1895. The new volume annual of the age. Of the greatest art in colors. Of the paintings of this year's Salon exhibits. Imperial 8vo, red silk cloth, with palette design. $10.00

ROB ROY—THE BETROTHED and THE TALISMAN.

By Sir Walter Scott. Handsomely new holiday editions. With introduction and notes by Andrew Lang. Handsomely illustrated with etchings and photographs on Japanese paper. Each 2 vols., 8vo, cloth. $6.00

Companion editions to "ROMOLA," "LAST DAYS OF POMPEII," "RIENZI," "IVANHOE," "KENILWORTH" and "HEART OF MIDLOTHIAN."

JULIAN. By William Ware. Handsomely printed from new type, and illustrated with historic scenes. Small 8vo, cloth, gilt top, uniform with our holiday editions of "ZENOBIA" and "AURELIAN." Each copy in a box. $2.50

VICTOR HUGO'S LETTERS TO HIS WIFE

They are included in no editions of his writings. Translated by Nathan Haskell Dole. 12mo, cloth, extra. $1.50

For sale by booksellers generally, or sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price by the Publishers.

ESTES & LAURIAT, Boston.

Light on the Cloud; or, Hints of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow. By M. J. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, gilt edges, $1.25.

"Veritable Masterworks."

So the New York Times pronounces the Stories in

The Life of Nancy

A new volume by

Sarah Orne Jewett.

16mo, $1.25.

"Among recent volumes of Short Stories 'The Life of Nancy' is one of the most delightful. . . . As we often have said before, in our judgment, no other writer surpasses Miss Jewett in intelligent and sympathetic appreciation of New England character or in the ability to describe it effectively." The Congregationalist, Boston.

"Miss Jewett knows her New England as Millet knew his France, and is supremely cognizant of its depth and richness, as she shows in a thousand ways too subtle for definition."—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

"The fine quality of Miss Jewett's perception and workmanship have never been more admirably displayed than in this optimistic, gracious, and deftly modulated volume."—Boston Beacon.

"Miss Jewett's art is of that perfect sort which leaves the reader with a sense of complete satisfaction, at the same time that it defies description by its very simplicity."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"Miss Jewett's charm is perennial." New York Times.

Miss Jewett's Other Books.

Deephaven. New England Sketches. 18mo, $1.25.

The Same. Holiday Edition. Beautifully illustrated. Crown 8vo, $2.50.

Country By-ways. Short Stories. 18mo, $1.25.

The Mate of the Daylight, and Friends Ashore. Sketches and Stories. 18mo, $1.25.

A Country Doctor. A Novel. 16mo, $1.25.

A Marsh Island. A Novel. 16mo, $1.25.

A White Heron, and Other Stories. 18mo, $1.25.

Old Friends and New. 18mo, $1.25.

The King of Folly Island, and Other People. 18mo, $1.25.

Play-days. Stories for Children. Square 16mo, $1.50.

Betty Leicester. A Story for Girls. 16mo $1.25.

Strangers and Wayfarers. 16mo, $1.25.

Tales of New England. 16mo, $1.00.

A Native of Winby, and Other Tales. 16mo, $1.25.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,
4 Park Street, Boston.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "Blessed be Drudgery," "A Year of Miracle," etc.

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

Published in three styles:

Gift edition, fine cloth, wide margins, 60 pages, 50 cents.

Paper, ornamental, 26 pages, 15 cents. (In white, if desired.)

Cheap edition, 6 cents (ten copies for 30 cents. net).

"In 'The House Beautiful,' Rev. Wm. C. Gannett describes, with a rare combination of good sense and poetic insight, the essentials of a beautiful home, giving to flowers, books, and guests, for instance, their due place in its furnishing, while love is the bond that binds all together in gracious influence."—Literary World.

"It is on the side of sincerity, quietness, and simplicity. Meets with our entire approval."—The Critic.

"Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on 'The dear Togetherness' is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. Our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and, if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so."—The New Unity.

* * * For sale by booksellers or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,

174 High Street, Boston.

Literary Notes.

The Christmas number of St. Nicholas is to contain the first series of Robert Louis Stevenson's letters to young friends in England, describing his Samoan home life.

The December issues of Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s "Riverside Literature Series" are (No. 87) Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe" and (No. 88) Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The "Robinson Crusoe" is printed from new plates prepared for this edition. It is attractively bound in paper at 50 cents, and in linen at 60 cents.

"Anarchy of Government," written by William M. Salter, and published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., states the problem of government, and balances the advantages and disadvantages of the two opposing systems in defensive war, in protecting life and property, in promoting the higher ends of life, and in the industrial realm. While he is willing to acknowledge that theoretically absolute freedom is an ideal state, he makes it evident that, so long as human nature is what it is, there must be safeguards from irresponsible and selfish aggressions. He therefore clinches his argument by a powerful example taken from a careful study of the Pullman Chicago strike of 1894. He believes fully in extending the province of government rather than in curtailing its powers. Nationalism has never received a more convincing help than this keen piece of reasoning.

The Magazines.

The Christmas number of the Ladies' Home Journal comes before Thanksgiving; but it is none too early for the many who will doubtless desire to make use of its many suggestions for holiday gifts and decorations. Serial articles are begun by Hon. Benjamin Harrison on "This Country of Ours," by Rudyard Kipling, Mary E. Wilkins, and Julia E. Magruder. The usual departments, conducted by the regular editors, have something of a Christmas flavor; and the entire number amply maintains the traditions of this popular journal.

The Phrenological Journal for November gives a phrenograph of Mme. Francesca Janaschek from personal examination, with the addition of a short biography and photograph. The letters of George C. Bartlett, "How Three People did Europe Afoot," are continued, as well as the story by Anna Olcott Commelin, "A Phrenologist's Predictions." There are the usual interesting departments.

Books Received.

From Estes & Lauriat, Boston.
Cricket. By Elizabeth Westyn Timlow. Illustrated by Harriet R. Richards. Price $2.00.
School-boy Days in Japan. By André Laurie. Translated by Laura E. Kendall. Illustrated. Price $1.50.
From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., Boston.
The Minute Man on the Frontier. By Rev. W. G. Pufferfoot. A.M. $1.25.
From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.
Ruling Ideas of the Present Age. By Washington Gladden. Price $1.25.
From Congregational Sunday School and Publishing Society, Boston.
Little Jolly's Christmas. By Harriet A. Cheever. Price 50 cents.
From Roberts Brothers, Boston.
A Daughter of Eve. By H. De Balzac. Translated by Katharine P. Wormeley. $1.50.
Some Unconventional People. By Mrs. J. Gladwyn Jebb, author of "A Strange Career." $1.25.
History of Dogra. By Dr. Adolph Harnock. Translated from the third German edition by Neil Buchanan. Vol. I. Price $2.50.
From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.
In Scripture Land: New Views of Sacred Places. By Edward L. Wilson, with 150 illustrations from original photographs by the author. Price $1.50.
Amos Judd. By J. A. Mitchell. Price 75 cents.
Domesticated Animals: Their Relation to Man and to his Advancement in Civilization. By Nathaniel Southgate Shaler. Illustrated. Price $2.50.
The Poor in Great Cities: Their Problems, and what is doing to solve them. By Robert A. Woods, William J. Tucker, Jacob A. Ellis, Sir Walter Besant, and others. Illustrated. Price $3.00.
From Macmillan & Co., New York.
The Modern Reader's Bible. The Proverbs, edited with an introduction and notes by Richard G. Moulton, M.A., Ph.D. Price 50 cents.
The Letters of Matthew Arnold, 1848-1888, collected and arranged by George W. E. Russell. Two volumes. Price $3.00.
The Year that the Locust hath eaten. By Annie E. Holdsworth. $1.25.
From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.
About Men: What Women have said. Chosen and arranged by Rose Porter. Price $1.00.
Great Men's Sons. By Elbridge S. Brooks. Price $1.50.
From Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York.
The Elements of the Higher Criticism. By Andrew C. Zeno. $1.00.
From the Arts and Letters Company, New York.
Fables and Essays. By John Bryan. Vol. I.
From Clark W. Bryan Company, Springfield, Mass.
Souvenir Verse and Story. Memorial of fifty years. By J. E. A. Smith.
From Harbette & Co., Paris, France.
Le Congrès des Religions à Chicago en 1893. Par G. Bonet-Maury. Ouvrage contenant 14 portraits.
From the Philosophical Union of University of California.
The Conception of God: An Address before the Union by Josiah Royce, Ph.D., with comments thereon.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.
The Mighty Lord. Sacred Song in E-flat, arranged from J. L. Roeckel. Adapted by Geo. B. Nevin.
Hark, the Hosts of Heaven are singing. Sacred song. Words adapted by Geo. B. Nevin. Music by W. H. Pontius.
There was a Joy in Heaven. Duet for soprano and contralto. By Henry Smart. Words by Bishop Heber.
The Shores of Life. Song. Words by Rev. Epiphanius Wilson. Music by R. A. Kaiser.
Sweet Land of Dreams. Waltz Song. By Will Allen Dromgoole. Music by E. L. Ashford.
Annie Lee. Song. Words by H. Francks. Music by J. A. Robertson.
I sat at my Latticed Window. Poetry by Miss Mae Duryea. Music by Herman Perlet.
I love only You. Words by Geo. B. Seevers. Music by J. L. Meyle.

SCRIBNER'S FOR CHRISTMAS

Is full of short stories and pictures. It is a magazine that primarily entertains and incidentally instructs, but does both in a way that fits into the spirit of the holiday season. It fills both the mind and the eye with enjoyment.

The most artistic thing in the Christmas number is "Alma-Tadema: His Career and Work," an elaborately illustrated article by Cosmo Monkhouse.

"Wild Beasts as They Live" is an illustrated article by Capt. J. C. Melliss, Bombay Infantry, vividly describing lion and tiger hunting.

"The Kinetoscope of Time," by Brander Matthews, an original and imaginative piece of fiction, fancifully illustrated by Oliver Herford.

Christmas Stories

Frank R. Stockton has a Christmas love story, which bears a characteristic title,—"The Staying Power of Sir Rohan." Its illustrations are quaint and exactly suitable.

A thrilling Detective story by C. E. Carryl, entitled "The River Syndicate," perhaps equalling Sherlock Holmes' best work. Illustrated.

Joel Chandler Harris' characteristic tale of a faithful slave, "The Colonel's Nigger-Dog."

Other Christmas stories are "A White Blot," by Henry Van Dyke, a poetic and imaginative tale of a picture (illustrated); "The Heroism of Landers," by A. S. Pier (illustrated); and "Hopper's Old Man," by R. C. V. Meyers.

On sale at Newsdealers, 25 cents

“SENTIMENTAL TOMMY”

By J. M. Barrie

Those who have read (and who has not?) "The Little Minister" and "A Window in Thrums" can anticipate what Mr. Barrie's "Sentimental Tommy" will be. It is to be the chief serial in SCRIBNER'S for 1896, beginning in the January number.

Mr. Barrie is an author who makes characters that live,—real people who exist in vivid lifelike scenes and haunt the memory in after years. In this latest work, on which he has been engaged nearly four years, he has shown more genius and power than in any previous productions. "Sentimental Tommy" promises to be the great literary success of the coming year.

Two Years for $4.50

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE costs $3.00 a year, but new subscribers can have all the numbers for 1895 and a year's subscription for 1896 for $4.50.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE is going to be better next year than ever. It is going to have new features. Its publishers are not satisfied with past successes. It purposes to more thoroughly deserve the confidence of the reading public.

The History Serial—"Last Quarter-Century in the United States"—will be continued. Just now it is approaching a period of absorbing interest to the present generation,—the first administration of President Cleveland.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE ought to get careful consideration as a Christmas gift. The $4.50 offer ought to get double consideration.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York

J. W. Chadwick's Books.

A BOOK OF POEMS.

Square 18mo. Cloth, $1.25.

"A collection of poems of a very high class, evincing an educated taste, deep religious fervor, an appreciative eye for the beautiful, and fine poetic feeling."—Inter-Ocean.

THE FAITH OF REASON.

16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

"When we consider their quality, we marvel; for what sermons of the day can compare with these in richness, force, and beauty?"

THE MAN JESUS.

16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

At all Bookstores. Mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, Publishers, Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crosswell Cressey, Ph.D.

In "The Essential Man" Dr. Cressey has given an interesting and profitable study of a problem which can never grow old as long as man is what he is. . . This little volume is thoroughly modern in tone, absolutely clear, free from either traditionalism or sentimentality, and brings out better than any work of the same size which we know the fundamental facts disclosed by the modern study of mind and nature which lead to a rational assurance of a life to come. If one wished simply to sharpen his own philosophical thinking, he could hardly do better than to test it by the clear propositions of this book.—The Hartford Seminary Record.

It is a healthful and helpful book which no one can read without profit.—The New World.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

A New Book by the author of "Jed" and "Tom Clifton."

Jack Alden.

A Story of Adventures in the Virginia Campaigns, '61-'65. By WARREN LEE GOSS. 16 illustrations by Frank T. Merrill. 12mo. cloth, $1.50.

Mr. Goss is known as one of the best writers of War Stories. Every boy who has read his "Jed" or "Tom Clifton" will surely want a copy of "Jack Alden."

For sale by all booksellers.

T. Y. CROWELL & CO., New York and Boston.

THE Atlantic Monthly FOR DECEMBER

CONTAINS

The Starving Time in Old Virginia

By JOHN FISKE.

A New England Woodpile. (An Out-door Sketch.) By ROWLAND E. ROBINSON.

The Defeat of the Spanish Armada. By W. F. TILTON.

An Idler on Missionary Ridge. (A Tennessee Sketch.) By BRADFORD TORREY.

Notes from a Travelling Diary. (A Study of New Japan.) By LAFCADIO HEARN.

Being a Typewriter. (The machine in literature.) By LUCY C. BULL.

A Letter to a Friend in Politics. (An Anonymous Letter.)

The Song of the Shepherd-boy at Bethlehem. (A Poem.) By JOSEPHINE PRESTON PEABODY.

New Figures in Art and Literature. III. Hamlin Garland.

The Hamadryad. (A Poem.) By EDWARD A. UFFINGTON VALENTINE.

Truth and the White Lie: A Conversation By EDITH M. THOMAS.

Three Short Stories.

Witchcraft. By L. DOUGALL.

The End of the Terror. By ROBERT WILSON.

Dorothy. By HARRIET LEWIS BRADLEY.

Further chapters of The Seats of the Mighty, book reviews, and the usual departments.

35 cents a number; $4.00 a year.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,
4 Park Street, Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-voice; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Channing Auxiliary Calendar

FOR 1896.

RHYMES AND CHIMES.

The Poetry of Steeples,

The Bell in the Belfry.

Beautifully printed in brown on Japanese paper. Boxed. Price $1.00, including postage. Address

CHANNING PUBLISHING COMMITTEE,
1300 Taylor Street, San Francisco.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

IN THE BORDER-LAND.

BY MABELLE P. CLAPP.

I wonder if the angels come to thee
As thou art waiting in the border-land,
And whisper low, the while they hold thy hand,
Of that new home thou canst but dimly see;
And if the heavenly light hath pierced the mist
That shrouds the vast beyond until its glow
Transforms to gold the river's turbid flow,
Whose waves e'en now thy tired feet have kissed.

I wonder if the voices thou canst hear
Of loved ones waiting on the other side,
Calling to thee across the ebbing tide
With loving words of hope and faith and cheer;
And if the flower of life will slow unfold
Before thy wondering eyes at last in heaven,
Until—O rapturous thought—to thee is given
To gaze deep down into its heart of gold.

And, more than all, I wonder if God's face
Grows nearer, dearer, as the shadows flee;
If thou canst feel his arms enfolding thee,
Through all the waiting, in a close embrace.
Thou answerest not, but words of comfort come
In the grand promise of the long ago,
"Lo! I am with you always"; and I know
No harm can touch thee on thy journey home.

For the Christian Register.

JACK MERRILL'S THANKSGIVING.

BY LYMAN HAMLIN.

It was the Saturday before Thanksgiving, sixty years ago; and Jack Merrill and his mother sat before the fire, talking of the coming holiday. It was snowing gently outside, and the landscape had a very wintry look.

"I guess, Jackie," Mrs. Merrill was saying, "we can't have any turkey this Thanksgiving. You see I haven't been paid yet for last month's vests; an' I have to save every cent I can toward that mortgage, an' that's due next week."

Jack had been expecting, for a week, to hear this, so now he was prepared to say cheerfully:—

"All right, mother: we can get along first-rate without one, I guess. But will the squire turn us out if the mortgage ain't paid?"

"Oh, no," replied his mother. "Why, Squire Billings is a very kind-hearted man, and probably wouldn't say a word if we never paid it. But I shan't feel right unless it's all settled this year. I've saved all but about twelve dollars; and when it is all paid to the squire," her eyes brightened, "then we shall own our dear little home. O Jackie!"

Jack's eyes sparkled, too, as he looked at his mother with pride. "Won't that be fine!" he exclaimed, jumping up to take the vests she was finishing down to Felton's.

She helped him don his outdoor wraps, sighing involuntarily as she beheld the forlorn appearance of almost every garment, and said:—

"Tell Mr. Felton how much I need the money, and I'll try to plan a magnificent Thanksgiving dinner while you're gone." She gave him a kiss; and off he went, ploughing through the deep snow. The flakes had ceased falling, the air was clear and bracing; and he enjoyed the walk immensely.

"'Twon't be the first Thanksgivin' we ain't had a turkey," he mused, throwing up a spray of fine crystals at every step. "Fact, we never had one that I remember, 'cept when the parson lived with us. An' that was a rooster. My, but wa'n't it fine!" His mouth watered at the recollection. "Wonder what mother'll make out to have. Punkin-pies, o' course." And so he went on, picturing to himself a royal feast, so that before long he found himself at the shop.

Having done his errand,—unable, however, to obtain any pecuniary satisfaction from the proprietor,—he thought he would go over to the store. Not to ask for letters,—for his mother never received any,—but to have a possible chat with "Cap'n" Simpson, the friend of all the boys of the neighborhood.

"Simpson & Co., Meats and Provisions," was over the porch of the establishment; and under the porch was the "Cap'n" himself.

"Hallo, Jack!" said he. "You're just the boy I want to see. Want a job this week?"

Jack was surprised.

"What doin'?" he inquired.

"Takin' Frank's place, sweepin', makin' fires, deliverin', an' takin' orders. He wants ter spend the week ter hum,—that's Tassamog, next town but one; 'n' I don't blame him much."

"Well, well," thought Jack, "here's a good chance to help mother on that mortgage." So he said aloud,—

"I'll be glad enough to do it, sir, if you think I'm able."

"Oh, bless you! I'll risk that," said the genial "Cap'n." "Come to-morrow mornin' at six,—no, Monday mornin', o' course. It'll be only a dollar a day."

If the "Cap'n" had said a shilling a day, Jack would have been satisfied. A dollar a day! The idea of earning such enormous wages so bewildered him that he ran plump into a tree when he left the store. This had the effect of rousing him, and sending him home with all possible haste.

Greatly to his delight, his mother gave her consent to the plan. "I've never let you work, Jackie," said she, "because I want you to get a good education first; but it may do you good to get a little business experience durin' vacation."

So Jack was on hand punctually Monday morning, and resumed Frank's duties. It was a new experience for him, and he liked it. So well and so conscientiously did he perform all his duties that the "Cap'n" remarked one night to Ed Scott that he was "a capital hand, an' no mistake."

Jack had intended to buy with a part of his wages a turkey as a Thanksgiving surprise for his mother. But, on second thought, he decided to give every cent toward the mortgage; for a turkey was a luxury, anyhow, and perhaps they might have one Christmas.

So, as he was shutting up the store Thanksgiving morning, just before meeting-time,—for in those days no one stayed away from Thanksgiving service unless to watch the dinner,—he was somewhat surprised when the "Cap'n" handed him a package, saying:—

"Well, Jack, you've done so well, so fur, that I'm goin' to give you a little bird for dinner. Tell your mother I'm 'most ashamed to send it up so late; but, I 'clar', I never thought of it till you said this mornin' you were goin' without."

With no little confusion, but with due expressions of gratitude, Jack accepted the gift, and trudged homeward with it, the "Cap'n" beaming upon him from the store piazza.

He had just turned up the lane that led to his house, and, with his eyes on the ground, was thinking how fine the turkey—for it was a turkey—would be with the cranberry sauce, when suddenly two rough-looking, shabbily attired men stepped from behind a snow-laden bush, and stood right in his path.

"Hullo, bub!" said one. "Wot yer got there?"

Jack was tremendously astonished.

"Strangers," thought he; "but uncivil enough, surely." A few years later he would have called them tramps; but at that time members of this erratic class of society were almost unknown in New England. However, he was quick to reply, "Never you mind," and dodged aside to avoid them.

But the one who had spoken was quick, also; for he made a grab for the boy, and, gripping both his arms like a vise, tripped him up and held him, face downward, on the snow. Meanwhile his companion wrenched the bundle from Jack's helpless hands, and investigated.

Jack, finding that struggling was useless, now began to cry out; and the tramp at once returned the turkey, saying:—

"Here, bub, take yer turk, an' scud. 'Tain't nothing' but a raw turk, Bill," to his pal; "an' I'd rather hev mine coked, eh?" with a wink and a nod up the lane which Jack did not see.

"Thet's so," said the other, with a grin, releasing the boy. "Ta-ta, bub: you're plucky."

Jack, only too glad to have the precious fowl once more in his possession, jumped up, instantly, planted a farewell blow in his captor's stomach, and sped for home, without once looking behind him.

As soon as they returned from meeting, Mrs. Merrill prepared the dinner; while Jack brought in wood, picked out the apples, and cracked a bowlful of nuts. For fear it might spoil her dinner, he said nothing to his mother about his unfortunate experience before meeting.

"We shall have a late dinner," said his mother, "but it will be a grand one—for us. And, being so rich to-day, we must remember old Mr. Dacre."

Mr. Dacre was a poor old man who lived in a little house all by himself.

At two o'clock the turkey was over the fire; and Jack assumed the pleasant though monotonous duties of turnspit. Outdoors the clouds were thick and dark, and there was every prospect that the dinner must be eaten by candle-light.

In about an hour Mrs. Merrill brought a chair to the hearth, and sat opposite him. The turkey looked delicious and tempting; and, to make the time pass more quickly and pleasantly, she entertained him with some charming stories of her girlhood. At length Jack asked her to tell him something about his father.

"Well," said his mother, thoughtfully, "let me see. You are fourteen now,—yes, I guess you are old enough to hear about Thanksgiving night thirteen years ago."

Sure of an interesting story, Jack settled back, and listened attentively.

"You've often heard me tell what a genius with tools your father was. He was a locksmith by trade, but spent most of his time in fashioning little contrivances, which he very often sold. Well, when Philip, who died, was about two years old, father got the idea that he could invent a bit that would bore square holes,"—here she made a feeble attempt to smile; while Jack, to whom such a scheme suggested little less than insanity, listened anxiously for the sequel,—“and, against all my entreaties, worked at it steadily for over two years. He became hopelessly in debt; and at last we had to live in such poverty that it seemed to spur him on to greater efforts. He worked late every night, and bent all his energies to what I considered madness; but, at length, his genius prevailed: he mastered the last difficulty, and exhibited the model to the townspeople. What pride he felt in the device! It was clumsy, but it worked well; and he sent it to Washington. After a lot of red-tape and lawyer's fees, which he paid with borrowed money, the patent came; and, oh, how happy he was! I myself never could see much good in the paper, for it didn't mean money to me as it did to him."

"He found it would take too much capital to manufacture the tool, and, to avoid being cheated out of royalties by unscrupulous men, decided to go to New York and sell the patent to some capitalists he had once known. He said, as he left, 'I shall be home Thanksgiving Day, surely, Emma; and I will bring you a few thousand dollars for a present.'"

"Even then I didn't think his trip would amount to much; and I felt very lonely during his absence. Thanksgiving morning I had a fowl roasting at eleven o'clock, for I couldn't afford a turkey; and I expected he'd get along to dinner. So I stayed away from meetin'; but he didn't appear."

"Noon came, and I began to feel uneasy. I couldn't eat anything; and I sat by the front window, and heard the clock strike one, two, three, four, and five. I felt sure he had met with an accident, when suddenly I saw a sleigh coming up the lane. Father was in it, of course, with a stranger, to whom, upon alighting, he gave some money. The man drove away; and father entered, with such a triumphant look upon his face that I knew his trip had been successful. I tell you I was glad to see him, and he was glad to get home. The stage had broken down about twenty miles from here, and after dinner he hired this man to drive him over. His voice was very hoarse, and I thought he looked extremely weak. He had evidently taken cold, but he said it was nothing serious. He declared our dinner, or supper, was the best he ever ate; and—What was that noise, Jack?" she exclaimed, interrupting herself with a start.

Both listened, but it was not repeated.

"Only the creaking of the roof, mother." "Well, I've always felt uneasy about that shed-roof coming so near the ground," said Mrs. Merrill. "Any ill-disposed person might go right up and come down the chimney while we were all asleep."

"Nobody'd be likely to come up the lane for anything valuable."

"Well, p'r'aps not. P'r'aps I'm nervous,

Anyway, as I was saying, after supper, which was really dinner, your father took out of his valise a little tin box; and out of this he took a small package of papers, which he waved triumphantly. It was the payment for all his patent rights. How I admired him, then! I believe that evening was the happiest of our lives."

"When he retired for the night, he locked the precious box in a bureau drawer, and put the key under his pillow."

"In the morning he was very feverish, and I went out for the doctor. When I returned, he was out of his head, and could talk of nothing but signatures and contracts. He remained in this condition for almost a week; but the exposure had been fatal, and he died Wednesday night." She paused a moment to wipe the tears from her eyes, and then went on:—

"During his entire sickness I had not given a thought to the little box; but, after a long time, when I had recovered from the shock, I opened the bureau drawer. But the box was gone! I was almost overcome with grief, not merely at the loss of the money, but because your father had worked so long and so hard for it. I searched the house from garret to cellar, and the shop, too. But it never appeared, and the mystery of its disappearance has never been solved."

"The capitalists, I think, must have put some one at work on an improvement of the bit; for I never heard of their manufacturing it. And I never saw one for sale. I have always thought since that your father was considerably ahead of his time."

"The rest of the story you know,—that is, how ever since I have been trying to buy back our dear little home."

"How persevering father was!" said Jack. Then he added, "I mean to search the place for that money to-morrow."

Mrs. Merrill smiled through her tears, and went into the dining-room to light the candles. Presently she called, "Leave the turkey a minute, Jack, and help me move the table, please." Jack obeyed. "There," when it was done, "that's all right. Now"—Her words were drowned in a sudden commotion in the kitchen,—a long, loud rumble, followed by a crash. They rushed to the spot; but, for some reason, the fire was extinguished, and they could see nothing. Mrs. Merrill ran back for a light; while Jack, hearing a noise upon the roof, and, in an instant guessing its cause, rushed outdoors, bareheaded.

He could just discern a man with a basket, running like a deer down the lane. The next minute another man, with a coil of rope under his arm, came around the corner of the house, and shot after the other. Jack, never hesitating, made after the thieves as fast as the snow would permit. But the man's long legs gave him a decided advantage; and he was fast leaving the boy behind, when Jack noticed that the rope was uncoiling and trailing after him. "Last chance," thought he; and, making a desperate effort, he managed to grasp the end of the rope. This had the effect of throwing the man to the ground; and Jack quickly ran up to where his captive lay, stiff and still. The tramp, however,—for is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

A Good Almanac

The Sunlight Almanac

for 1896 contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free

to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them.

Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents.

A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 330).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

Jack quickly recognized him as one of his morning's assailants,—was only feinting; for he arose at once, knocked the boy into a snow-drift, and vanished.

Jack was only dazed a little, and, realizing that further pursuit was useless, picked himself up, and hastened home.

As he opened the door, a wretched sight met his eyes. A stifling dust filled the room; and all over the floor were strewn bricks, soot, bits of mortar, and ashes. The crane and the spit were upset, and the turkey was gone!

He sank, breathless, into a chair. Then he examined the rope which he had captured. "Look, mother!" said he, holding up a large iron hook, fastened to one end. "It's greasy! Don't you understand now what's been done? And the rope is part of our clothes-line." Then he related his morning's experience.

"And I was right about those noises on the roof," said his mother. "It was something besides nervousness. Evidently, they knocked down a lot of loose brick while pulling up the turkey."

"It's a mean, contemptible trick," said Jack, angrily. "Think of it,—the first turkey we've had for years!" And he burst out crying. For several minutes they sat thus, gazing in silence upon the debris; and then Jack arose. "Well, that milk's spilt; and there's no use crying. Let's have what's left, anyway. I've got some appetite left."

He accordingly began to dig out the buried apples. "Probably won't be fit to eat," he muttered gloomily. However, he rescued them all; and his mother brushed them off as well as possible. He then proceeded to excavate for the fire, when his shovel struck something metallic. Hastily throwing up the ashes, he disclosed a small black box. Trembling with excitement, he took it up in the shovel,—for it was too hot to touch,—laid it on the table, and called his mother, who had gone for a broom.

"O Jackie!" she exclaimed, when she saw it. "I believe it's the very!"—And, without finishing, she hurried upstairs. In a few minutes she returned with a tiny key.

"Oh, what if it should be!" cried Jack, as his mother applied the key to the box, which was now cooler. He was not disappointed. It fitted the keyhole exactly, the cover opened, and a small white package, sealed with red wafers, was disclosed to view. "It's the very one," said Mrs. Merrill, opening the package very tenderly; and her eyes were moist as she counted the precious papers.

"Will it pay the rest of the mortgage?" asked Jack, who had a very vague idea of patents and their values.

"Yes, dear, and more besides, if they have any value at all now. It will support me several years, until you are able to do it. For I hope you will want to, some day."

"I should rather think so!" said Jack, earnestly. "But isn't that fine! Hurrah!"

"Yes, dear, it is very fortunate for us. I think your father must have felt that the money was not safe in the bureau, and so took it out in the night, and hid it behind some loose bricks in the chimney, where I never thought of looking for it."

"And where it has remained safe for thirteen years," said Jack, "to a day."

"It is truly the work of Providence," replied his mother. "But we must think of some one besides ourselves. Now, if you'll take a basket of food down to old Mr. Dacre, we'll have our dinner when you return."

So Jack took a bountiful dinner to the old man, who was glad enough to see him, and was very profuse in his thanks and praises of Mrs. Merrill.

Thus, at last, Jack and his mother sat down to their so happily delayed dinner. And it was a glorious feast, notwithstanding the loss of the turkey. What pies they had! What cranberry sauce! What pudding, apples, and nuts!

"I hate to think of such villains enjoying our turkey," remarked Jack; "but they did us a good turn, as it happened. We wouldn't have had the little tin box if we hadn't lost our turkey."

"I'm real glad it is found," said his mother. "It is a night to be thankful for, and I think the least we can do is to thank God for it."

So, as they sat with bowed heads, the widow gave thanks to the Father for his goodness. It was a heartfelt Thanksgiving, in its truest sense.

GRANDMA'S DRAWER.

It was a rainy Saturday. Bertha was helping grandma arrange the drawer in her sewing-table; and that was such delightful work, because everything in grandma's drawer had a story.

There were little heart-shaped pincushions, made out of flowered silk, which grandma's schoolmates gave her long ago; and she had some funny anecdote about each of the little girls that made them.

Then there were queer outline portraits cut out of black paper, and rings and ribbons, and a handkerchief with two doves drawn in the corner, which grandma carried once at a wedding.

"Oh, what cunning red shoes!" cried Bertha, pulling a little pair out of the corner.

"I remember the day they were made," said grandma, looking at them through her glasses. "There was no shoe store near us, and old Preserved White used to go from house to house making shoes for the neighbors. When he came to our house, he took out of his box a piece of red morocco and a piece of black, and asked my mother which she would have for my shoes. How pleased I was when she chose the red!"

"I remember the first time that I wore them, too. My father and mother took me with them on a journey. We travelled in our own carriage, and stopped at the neat little taverns along the way. One day we visited the governor, and I wore my new shoes and a dress of cream-colored Canton crepe."

"I was very much afraid of the governor, and afraid, too, that I should slide out of the great slippery chair, with a horsehair cover, where I sat, dangling my little red shoes. So I was very glad when his little girl said to me, 'Come upstairs, and I will show you my 'winky doll.'"

"We went up the long stairs and into little Clarissa's room. She opened the great mahogany wardrobe, and took out a sweet-smelling box, and out of the box such a wonderful doll."

"You would not think much of it, I suppose; but I had never seen or heard anything like it before, and, when it snapped open its black eyes and stared straight at me, I could hardly believe it was not alive. I think I was never so proud in my life as when little Clarissa actually laid in my own lap that beautiful 'winky doll!'"

"The next year my little friend came with her parents to our country home; and, while they were with us, such a funny thing happened."

"It was when they had just arrived, and we were sitting in the best parlor, looking very prim and dignified: that was the fashion then. The grown folks were talking slowly and gravely, while we children sat as still as two little statues, when we heard a queer noise in the hall."

"You see my father kept several hundred sheep; and that spring had been cold and stormy, so that six little lambs lost their mothers. We took them into the warm kitchen, and fed and petted them a great deal, they were such helpless little things."

"But, when they grew big, they were very troublesome; for they remembered how well they had been treated in the house, and they used to run in at the open door whenever they had a chance. So we had to turn them out in the pasture with the other sheep."

"Now it happened on the very day the stately governor came to see us that our unruly pets got loose in some way, and all came trotting toward the house. Clatter, clatter, went their little hoofs up the front steps and through the long entry, till they reached the parlor door; and there they all stood still for a minute, with such a comical look of surprise, and then they scampered away, pell-mell."

"We children giggled; but the governor was a gentleman of the old school. He never smiled, and went on talking politics as if it had been a very common thing for a flock of sheep to go racing through a parlor."

"What a pleasant visit it was! while little Clarissa and I wandered all over the farm, trying all the wild playthings that country children can find in the woods and fields. I am sure that we enjoyed them more than all the 'winky dolls' and fine red shoes in the world."—Youth's Companion.

GOOD FOR THE MAYOR.

The following incident took place a few years ago in a city of Tennessee:—

A poor little girl was peddling apples in a railway station. A train was about starting; and almost at the last moment a tall, ruffianly passenger stepped off the cars, and called for fifteen cents' worth of the apples. The girl counted them out, the man took them, and then, as he moved toward the car, began feeling in his pocket as if for the money. The change was not forthcoming, he was on the steps, the train began to move, the girl ran eagerly after it; and there stood the man on the platform, laughing at her.

By good luck the mayor of the city happened to be among the bystanders,—a war veteran, with a tender heart and a contempt for all meanness. He ran at once to the superintendent's office, and said,—

"I'll give you a hundred dollars to stop that train, and have it backed into the station."

The offer was promptly accepted, a telegram was despatched, and very soon the player of the joke found himself in the hands of the police. He paid the girl her fifteen cents, of course, and offered to pay her a good deal more; but the officers were inexorable, and, to the gratification of the lookers-on, he was marched off to jail.—Exchange.

ABOUT THE RAINBOW.

We all know the Scriptural interpretation of the rainbow, but mythology has also had its say upon the same theme. The Scandinavians thought it was a celestial bridge, by which the gods passed to and fro: it was doomed to break down at the last day. Children are still sometimes told that, if they will walk to the spot from which the rainbow springs, they will find a pot of gold. There was an idea that the rainbow draws up water by means of two golden dishes, which it sometimes lets fall, and which have been secured by lucky finders. A Black Forest legend asserted that the rainbow draws its water by a golden goblet, and that a shoe thrown into a rainbow would return filled with gold. In Serbia the folk used to say that to pass beneath a rainbow changed the sex,—made a man a woman, or the reverse. The Suabians, when there is a double rainbow, say that it is the devil trying to imitate the work of God.—Harper's Round Table.

The introduction of mahogany into England and the commerce of the world was caused by the repairing with a plank of that wood of one of Sir Walter Raleigh's vessels in 1595.

A discussion of salt (like salt itself) is always seasonable. We argue the merits of Bradley's the only salt which will not harden, and is free from lime and dirt. Price is right; quality cannot be better. See that your grocer supplies you—he can get it if you really want it. Sample bag mailed free—send your address on a postal.

"Yorkshire" Salt

We make all kinds and grades of salt. Whatever price you pay, see that you get Bradley's—it will be the best salt made for the money.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,
49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

"THERE IS SCIENCE IN NEATNESS."
BE WISE AND USE

SAPOLIO

Stul'n

Ulcers

due to disease, or an impoverished condition of the blood, are a source of annoyance to the medical fraternity. While continually growing deeper and larger the circle of diseased flesh surrounding them is all the time extending, closing up the ducts through which replenishment of tissue should come. For such troubles physicians everywhere are praising the results obtained by the use of

Bovinine

In the first place the system needs re-invigorating, new flesh tissue should be formed, new and pure blood created, in fact, a new and well nourished body where room for disease does not exist. Food is the thing, and Bovinine, that greatest concentration of the vitalizing elements of lean beef, is the most fitting nourishment of all for speedy results. Then applied externally it nourishes by absorption, where the disease is most apparent, thus striking the enemy on all sides. Ask any Druggist.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

1847

Rogers

Bros.

Make sure of the "1847" if you wish the genuine original Rogers Silverware.

Meriden Britannia Company

MERIDEN, CONN.
208 Fifth Ave., NEW YORK.

XMAS

DIALOGUES. Pieces to Speak and how to get up Fascinating Sunday School Entertainment—all 10c. J. & F. B. MYERS, 88 John St., N. Y.

New York, N.Y., 11 West 86th St.

THE JACOTOT SCHOOL. (adj. Central Park). A Boarding & Day School for Girls. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Fall term begins Oct. 1. Kindergarten begins Oct. 15.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS. Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

ORGANIST.

A Harvard man, experienced, is open to engagement as organist. Address E. M. J., Box 348, Boston Post-office.

A PHYSICIAN'S WIDOW, who has travelled extensively abroad, will conduct a small party through Spain, Southern France, Italy, and Egypt, leaving New York by S.S. "Kaiser Wilhelm," Jan. 22, 1896. References exchanged. Address Mrs. Dr. RAN-DOLPH, 179 Herkimer Street, Brooklyn, N.Y.

THE STARS.

I lay at my ease in my little boat,
Fast moored to the shore of the pond,
And looked up through the trees that swayed in the breeze
At God's own sky beyond.

And I thought of the want and the sin in the world,
And the pain and the grief they bring;
And I marvelled at God for spreading abroad
Such sorrow and suffering.

Evening came creeping over the earth,
And the sky grew dim and gray,
And faded from sight; and I grumbled at Night
For stealing my sky away.

Then out of the dark just the speck of a face
Peeped forth from its window bars,
And I laughed to see it smile at me.
I had not thought of the stars!

There are millions of loving thoughts and deeds
All ripe for awakening
That never would start from the world's cold heart
But for sorrow and suffering.

Yes, the blackening night is sombre and cold,
And the day was warm and fine;
And yet, if the day never faded away,
The stars would never shine!

—Robert Beverly Hale, in Harper's Weekly.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Of brilliant and showy meetings we Gothamites have been having a surfeit of late.

In combined interest and brilliancy the last meeting of the Nineteenth Century Club must be accorded the palm. It secured the privilege of a lecture from the English author, Mr. Hall Caine, who spoke on "The Novel and the Drama, and the Moral Responsibility of the Author,"—the almost identical subject discussed at the New York Unitarian Club last winter. Mr. Caine, as might be supposed, believed that the author should have complete liberty of conscience, that he should be free to find his subject in any scene of life, that he should be allowed to get very close to human nature. But woe to those authors who abuse this intimacy, who wrong it by want of sincerity or reticence, who use it without discretion! Such are moral anarchists, armed with a dynamite that ought to be called damnation. A very large audience was present to do honor to Mr. Caine's scholarly address, which was followed with keen appreciation, and rewarded with abundant applause.

Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, who is so well known in our Unitarian body, is president of the Excise Reform Association, the object of which is to secure the best possible excise laws. To this end it has carefully studied all the experiments for the regulation of the liquor traffic which have been tried in other States and countries, in order that it may frame a bill which will reform the administration of the excise laws in this city, provided its enactment into a law can be secured at the forthcoming session of the legislature. It will also introduce a local option bill. The result of our recent political campaign has not lessened the intense public interest in this whole excise matter, and whether liquor shall be sold on Sunday is still a burning question. It appears that some members of the association favor the sale of wines, beers, and ale on Sundays, and believe that the European beer gardens would be beneficent institutions in this country. Undoubtedly, the Germans, and some others who are not habitually addicted to drinking strong liquors, would approve a law embodying this provision. But, whether or not the association finally determines to embody in its bills any relaxation of the restriction on the Sunday sale of liquors, it is pretty certain that any bill framed with that end in view could not become a law, owing to the fact that the country legislators who were elected to Albany a few weeks ago, and who are in the majority, are not in favor of changing the present unpopular excise law.

It is interesting to note that the New York League of Unitarian Women is to make its contribution to the general discussion of the temperance question. Among the very timely and interesting subjects on its annual programme, which has just been issued, is "The Economics of Temperance."

The Presbyterians of this city have been giving our great dailies subject-matter for some fine editorials on the advisability of aiding foreign missions. One of them was by no less a personage than ex-President Harrison, who presided at a large gathering of Presbyterians in Carnegie Hall, and made the chief address of the evening. Mr.

Harrison evidently belongs to the old school of Orthodoxy, and favors missionary work for its efficacy in saving heathen souls from the torment of an endless hell. He would offer salvation to the heathen because there is but one name under heaven whereby they can find it. His emphasis of this point, and his praise of the Presbyterian Church for its "steel-beam stiffness" in standing for the faith delivered to us by the fathers, clearly indicate that he is unaware that the world, and the Church, too, as the editorials mentioned have clearly pointed out, have changed since the days when these old doctrines could be appealed to with the certainty that they would arouse enthusiastic interest in the salvation of the so-called heathen world.

M. A. M.

Here and There.

The old Spanish weights and measures which for so long a time have been in use throughout Mexico are to be abolished, since a decree recently passed makes the metric system alone legal from Sept. 16, 1896.

A curious engineering feat is about completed at Superior, Wis.,—the raising of one of the big grain warehouses of the Globe Elevator Company clear of its pile foundation, and letting it down upon a foundation built of masonry six inches higher than it formerly stood. The work was done by means of forty-eight five-ton jackscrews.

The Egyptological Museum in Cairo possesses the oldest herbarium in the world. It consists of a collection of wreaths and garlands taken from ancient tombs. All the flowers are perfectly preserved. The green rind of the watermelon retains its color. Most of these objects are four thousand years old.—Sacred Heart Review.

A great scheme has been laid before the London County Council by a committee of that body for supplying water to the metropolis from the mountains of Wales. The proposed source of supply is more than one hundred and fifty miles from London. The whole scheme involves the construction of two great aqueduct lines, entirely independent and miles apart, over this long distance, and the delivery of more than four hundred million gallons of water a day. The estimated cost of the work is almost two hundred million dollars, but it is proposed to construct only one of the two lines at present.

In Mexico there is a plant known by the name of "Palo de Leche." It belongs to the family of euphorbia. The Indians throw the leaves into the water; and the fish become stupefied and rise to the surface, and are then caught by the natives. In this case the effect of the narcotic soon passes off. The milk of this plant thrown upon the fire gives out fumes that produce nausea and headache. The milk taken internally is a deadly poison: it will produce death or insanity according to the size of the dose. There is a popular belief among the lower class in Mexico that the insanity of the ex-Empress Carlotta was caused by this poison.—San José Mercury.

Thanks

If all those who live and are strong by Scott's Emulsion should give thanks to-day, what a great shout would arise! Both Americas, Europe, Asia, Africa and all the islands of the seas would be singing in the grand thanksgiving anthem! The English of it would be: "How good it is to have the strength and beauty of health! How good is Scott's Emulsion!"

SCOTT'S EMULSION has been endorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. (Ask your doctor.) This is because it is always palatable—always uniform—always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites.

Put up in 50 cent and $1.00 sizes. The small size may be enough to cure your cough or help your baby.

"Just as good"
is never as good as

Scott's Emulsion

Everything connected with Butter.

—churns, patters, tubs, firkins—ought to be washed with Pearline. That gets at the soaked-in grease as nothing else in the world can. Things may seem to be clean when you've washed them in the usual way; but use Pearline, and they really are clean. It might make all the difference, sometimes, between good butter and bad. Wherever you want thorough cleanliness, or want to save your labor, the best thing to do is to use Pearline.

Send it Back

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back.

383

JAMES PYLE, New York.

Stylish Jackets, Capes, and Furs.

Ladies desiring a just equivalent for their money, and Outside Garments of the very latest style and finish, should call at

Springer Brothers,

and examine their New Jackets. Handsome, Genteel, and as satisfactory in price as can be found in Boston. Central Location. Well-lighted salesrooms and courteous attendants.

500 Washington St., corner Bedford St., Boston.

Just Published

A CATECHISM OF LIBERAL FAITH

By Rev. Charles F. Dole

The following extracts from the Preface show the character of this new manual: "The purpose of this Catechism is to further a thoughtful understanding of the good life. The wish here is to show that man belongs to an unseen universe; that this universe is divine and beneficent; that a certain distinct and noble type of thought, feeling, and conduct is in accord with such a universe; and that the highest and largest life grows out of the realization of these facts."

The book contains 34 chapters. Pages 112. In cloth, 35 cents a copy; per dozen, $3.50. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; per dozen, $1.80.

Revised Edition

UNITARIAN CATECHISM

By Rev. Minot J. Savage

We also have for sale Mr. Savage's Catechism (published by George H. Ellis), which has been used in our Sunday-schools for some time with great favor. The author says in his Preface: "This little Catechism has grown out of the needs of my own work. It is an attempt to help teachers and parents by putting in their hands in brief compass the principal things believed by Unitarians concerning the greatest subjects. This is an effort to make the path of ascertained truth a little plainer."

Pages 67. In cloth, 30 cents a copy; per dozen, $2.50. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; per dozen, $1.50.

Send orders to the

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.

If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Just Published.

The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics.

BY

THOMAS HILL, D.D., LL.D.

Contents:

PART I, POSTULATES OF REVELATION.—I. The Unseen Real; II. The Reality of Knowledge; III. The Infinite Knowable; IV. Final Causes; V. The Universe a Work of Art; VI. Power and Possibility; VII. Logic and Love; VIII. Beauty; IX. The Testimony of Conscience; X. The Infinite in Man; XI. Relativity and Reality; XII. The Universe a Revelation; XIII. Authority and Inspiration; XIV. Summary of Natural Sources of Religious Knowledge.

PART II, POSTULATES OF ETHICS.—I. The Field of Ethics; II. The Validity of Moral Perceptions; III. The Nature of Ethical Relations; IV. The Innocence and Sinfulness of Error; V. Love and Duty; VI. Determinism and Utility; VII. Duties Relative to Self; VIII. The Connection of Ethics with Religion; IX. Non-religious Morals and Moralists; X. Learning by Doing.

394 pages, with portrait, price $1.50.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.
3. Reaping Time.
4. Called to be Saints.
5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)
6. The Religious Situation.
7. The Forward Movement of Unitarianism. (By Rev. George Bachelor.)
8. Our Divine Partnership.
9. Dr. Gordon's Book, "The Christ of To-day."
10. Thanks that I can be Thankful.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MRS. STEPHEN H. BULLARD.

The Ladies' Commission on Sunday-school Books have placed on record their sense of the loss in the death of Mrs. Stephen H. Bullard: "We wish to record our sense of the loss, not only to the commission, but to the community, in the death of Mrs. Stephen H. Bullard. Succeeding Miss Lucretia Crocker as president of the commission, Mrs. Bullard held it fully to its original standard, and brought to it a conscientiousness that cared for the smallest details, a clear judgment, and a determination to give fair hearing to every person and every opinion.

"And we have been glad to know that, after she retired from office with us, these qualities were enlisted in the service of the public charities of Indian interests and of our own denomination. It is hard to estimate the value to the community of such faithfulness, and we wish to extend to her family our sympathy in their great loss."

Charities and Reforms.

IN BEHALF OF ARMENIA.—Three entertainments are to be given in Copley Hall, Boston, on the evenings of Thursday and Friday and on Saturday afternoon, December 5, 6, and 7, in behalf of the Armenian cause. The entertainment consists of a series of tableaux representing the marriage customs of different races. The manager is Miss Charlotte H. Allen, who works under the auspices of the United Friends of Armenia, of which Mrs. Julia Ward Howe is president. The tableaux are not only beautiful and attractive in themselves, but this offers an opportunity for people interested in Armenia to help a noble cause. Tickets for sale at the hall, at the Woman's Journal office, and the office of the Christian Register. Reserved seats, $2; unreserved, $1.

The Illinois Humane Society at Chicago reports that during September it investigated and remedied the condition of nineteen children, surrendered five children to institutions, placed seven children in institutions temporarily, four persons prosecuted for cruelty to children, six persons for cruelty to animals, laid up twenty-seven horses unfit for service, removed thirteen disabled animals by ambulance, killed twenty-six incurable and abandoned animals, reprimanded sixty-one teamsters and others, and imposed $212 in fines.

The desire for amusement is a part of human nature, and it should be met for all classes and conditions of men. Our best entertainments are too costly for the people who have to earn their own living by small salaries. For them especial efforts should be made. Berkeley Temple does its best in this way by providing twelve entertainments for a dollar, comprising readings, tableaux, concerts, bell-ringers, and stereopticon pictures. They give great pleasure to hundreds, and this practice might well be imitated by churches all through the city.

Personals.

Miss Alice C. Fletcher was elected one of the sectional vice-presidents of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. The honors to Miss Fletcher are the first of the sort extended to a woman by the Association, and the reading of her name was received with applause. But her conscientious and able studies of the customs and life of the Indians of the North-west have well earned for her the distinction.

Her section, the anthropological, appointed her one of the delegates to represent the Association at the International Congress of Americanists at Mexico.

Spirit of the Press.

The Journal of Education on "Overcrowded Schools":—

Chicago had 20,000 children in half-day divisions last year. She began the year with 19,843, and closed with 17,545, going as high as 20,221 for one month. Nor is Chicago alone in this practice of having half-day sessions: nearly every city relieves itself at times in this way, but Chicago has simply done it to a greater extent than any other city. If a half-day is all the school life that 20,000 children need, then it is wasteful to have 174,000 children in school all day. It is a great enterprise, this providing schools and school-houses for 200,000 children in a single city. Chicago requires at a conservative figure twenty new large school-houses at once; and, before they can be built, she will need several more. It is an endless conflict, this of providing ample accommodations for the school-children in a growing community. The public must insist that the supply of the buildings shall be equal to the demand. If a city falls behind one year, it is practically impossible to "catch up" with the demand. Eternal vigilance and prompt appropriations are needed. There is much talk of turning children away from school. This is all talk. There are few instances in the country in which any considerable number of children are refused admission; and, when they are, it is only temporary. In Chicago, with nearly 200,000 pupils in school, the largest number whose admittance was delayed was less than 90; and the average is less than 40, or 1 for 5,000, and Chicago has probably suffered more from overcrowding than any other city in the country.

Education.

The years of compulsory attendance at New York schools are from eight to fourteen. The arrests for truancy now amount to less than five hundred in a year, against one thousand, the average of ten years ago.

In Norway a law has recently been passed which makes girls ineligible for matrimony until they are proficient in knitting, baking, and spinning. Certificates of proficiency have to be earned, and without these no girl may marry.—Examiner.

The announcement is made of the opening in 1897 of an institute of female physicians at St. Petersburg. The privileges to be accorded to women who obtain the diploma of doctor of medicine, after having followed the course of instruction at the institute and undergone the examinations required, are much more considerable than they now enjoy. Up to the present time they have found the conditions to be unfavorable. Their right to practice medicine has been poorly defined, and has given rise to a number of misunderstandings. Medical Times.

Two hundred and fifty-eight students are entered for the course in "Modern Novels." The course is more popular than any other in Yale. The students who take the course are to read such modern novels as may be selected for them by Dr. Phelps, to examine their theme, style, and quality, and to compose a critical review of one or more of them, which composition will be brought before the class, where it may be made the subject of comment by the instructor. It is the opinion of Dr. Phelps that "the best literary thought of the day is going into the novel," and that "the novel is the most important form of literary art."

Temperance.

Forty-eight million pages of temperance leaflets have been published within the year by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association.

Cardinal Gibbons sent through Rev. William E. Bartlett greetings from the Catholic churches to the Baltimore convention, and a letter, in which he said, "The temperance cause is a most vital subject in our day, as on it hangs social order with domestic peace and comfort."

Dr. Bollinger, director of the Anatomico-Pathological Institute, in Munich, asserts that it is very rare to find a normal heart and normal kidneys in an adult resident of that city. The reason for the kidney disease is the tax put upon these organs by the drinking of excessive amounts of beer; and the cardiac hypertrophy and degeneration are secondary lesions, for the most part.

The Norwegian explorer, Dr. Nansen, who crossed Greenland, says: "My experience leads me to take a decided stand against the use of stimulants and narcotics of all kinds, from tea and coffee on the one hand, and tobacco and alcohol on the other. The idea that one gains by stimulating body and mind by artificial means betrays, in my opinion, not only ignorance of the simplest physiological laws, but also want of experience, or, perhaps, want of capacity to learn from experience and by observation."

Form and Finish

are essential features of elegant Silverware. Form is lasting, the finish or brilliancy produced by

SILVER

ELECTRO-SILICON POLISH

is of the highest degree and lasts as long as the form exists. It never scratches nor wears.

Grocers sell it.

It's unlike others. Send to us for sample.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

DIE

NONE SUCH

MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None Such Mince Meat. For sale by all Grocers. Be sure you get the None Such—avoid imitations.

MERRELL-SOULE CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

Its SCREW and PLUNGE LIFT for regulating Wick; Lift Attachment for LIGHTING without removing Chimney; SIMPLICITY of Design for Rewicking, and Cleanliness combine to make the

MILLER Lamp

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

All parts Interchangeable, any of them can be supplied, and it costs no more than the ordinary centre-draft Lamp without our Patented Improvements.

EDWARD MILLER & CO.,

Mill and Factories, Meriden, Conn.

63 Pearl Street, Boston.

No. 865. Wrought Iron Banquet.

Illustrated Catalogue Sent Free.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANLAND WAKE.
22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.
23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHELTON.
24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Supernatural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. BOYLES, M.D.
25. EVOLUTION OF ARMS AND ARMOR: The struggle for existence; Nature's methods; individualism and co-operation; final universal peace. By JOHN C. KIMBALL.
26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.
27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM: The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.
28. EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION: Early methods in Egypt, Persia, China, Greece, and Rome; early Christian ideas of education; Catholic and Protestant views; the common-school system. By MISS CAROLINE B. LE ROW.
29. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. I. The Theological Method. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
30. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. II. The Socialistic Method. By WILLIAM POTTS.
31. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. III. The Anarchistic Method. By HUGH O. PENTECOST.
32. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. IV. The Scientific Method. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
33. ASA GRAY: His life and work. By MRS. MARY TREAT.
34. EDWARD LIVINGSTON YOUNG: The Man and his work. By PROF. JOHN FISKE.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each. some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR NOVEMBER.

Unpardonable Sin. Rev. J. E. Roberts.
Savonarola: A Sketch. II. S. Fletcher Williams.
The Voice of Warning. James Rowe.
The Roman Catholic Church. Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D.
At the Morning. Maud L. Cotton.
The Glorious Gospel.
Demands of the Age.
Sunday School Association.
Remembrance. H. C. Tenney.
The English Congregationalists. J. T. Sunderland.
A Lesson from Tolstol. George S. Cottman.
Talk with Boys. Jessie Whitsitt.
A Service of Welcome to the Church. Rev. Albert Walkley.
Correspondence. Rev. Margaret T. Olmstead.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.
DEPARTMENTS:
American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Emily A. Fifield; Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Elliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.
2. The Beseeching God.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. 658 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

Pleasantries.

Jack explained a misstatement the other day by saying, "I misunderspoke."—Youth's Companion.

Baby had bumped his head. "Does it feel better?" asked mamma. "Yes," said baby: "it feels some better, but not all the better there is."—Youth's Companion.

A wee resident has been taught to save a piece of everything nice for "papa." When castor-oil was being administered, a bright thought struck the youngster. "I dess I'll save the rest for papa."—Advance.

Little Helen, who had never been in the country before, was taken to see nine little pigs, with their mother, in Farmer W.'s pig-pen. "How many are going to be drowned, mamma?" she inquired.—Youth's Companion.

It was a very cold morning, and Bobbie came rushing into the house very much excited. "Mommer," he cried, "there's something the matter with me. Please send for the doctor. I'm breathing fog!"—Harper's Round Table.

"You don't tell me that Prof. A. has been struck dumb?" "He has." "And wasn't he master of seven languages?" "He was." "And is it possible that he was struck dumb in all seven? How extraordinary!"—Texas Siftings.

A little three-year-old had often watched with much interest his grandpa stirring his coffee before drinking; and, one morning, thinking that grandpa had forgotten to do this, he said, "Why don't you wind up your coffee, grandpa?"—Advance.

It is said that during one of Mr. Moody's meetings a worker approached a young man with the question, "Are you a Christian?" The young man looked up, smiling good-naturedly as he replied, "Oh, no, sir: I am one of the choir."—Standard.

May: "Just think, Bob is playing on the Yale football team!" Clara: "That's jolly. What is he, half-back or quarter-back?" May: "Neither. He's a drawback. Charley Pruyenne says he's the greatest drawback the team ever had."—Exchange.

"Papa," said Jimmieboy, "you are the nicest man in the world." "And you are the nicest boy in the world," said his father. "Yes: I guess that's so," said Jimmieboy. "Isn't it queer how we both managed to get into the same family?"—Harper's Round Table.

A musician, brought to despair by the playing of a lady in a room above his own, met her one day in the hall with her three-year-old child, and said in a most friendly manner: "Your little one there plays remarkably well for her age. I hear her practise every day."—Tid-Bits.

An exchange reports that the teacher of a city school received the following ample apology from the mother of an absentee: "Dere mam: ples eggscuse Willy He didn't have but one pair of pants an' I kep' him home to wash them and Mrs. O'toole's goat come and et them off the line and that awt to be eggscuse enuff, goodness nose. Yours with respec, Mrs. B."—Youth's Companion.

In a Vermont granite-quarrying town many Italians are employed, and are much liked by the Vermonters who "boss" them. Last year one of the Italians, after trying in vain to eat some of the beef furnished by the corporation, gave up in comical despair, and began to wrap it in a scrap of tinsel paper that he drew out of his pocket. "What are you doing there?" asked the foreman from the head of the table. "I senna heem to de World's Fair," answered the Italian, indicating the beef. "What for?" "Because I be sure dat beefa he de same what geeve milk for my countryman, Cristoforo Colombo!"—Youth's Companion.

PASTEUR AND THE MICROBES.

There is a rather good story told about Pasteur to-day. He was dining with his daughter, her husband, and their family one evening in their country residence in Burgundy. Cherries formed part of the dessert; and the savant ate a good many, taking care, however, to dip the fruit well in a glass of water, and then to wipe it thoroughly dry before putting it to his mouth. His scrupulous care caused mild laughter at the table, whereupon Pasteur gently rebuked his relatives for their indifference to the fact that the exteriors of the cherries were covered with infinitesimal and invisible microbes. He then launched forth into a long argument to prove the existence of the unseen animalculæ, and wound up by advising his hearers never to touch fruit without washing it. A few moments afterward the savant, who had fallen into one of his fits of abstraction, suddenly seized the glass in which he had washed the cherries, and drank the water and the microbes contained therein at a single draught.—London Telegraph.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Vacuum Oil Company.

THE OIL
THAT LUBRICATES
MOST.

45 Purchase St.,
BOSTON. Telephone 1839.

CLOCKS.

FRENCH
TRAVELLING
ENGLISH
HALL, GILT AND CRYSTAL.

GUARANTEED TIME-KEEPERS

Bigelow,
Kernard & Co.
501 Washington St. cor. West.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS
men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times
DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT in NEW YORK
With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs.
Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott.
A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. 86th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed it." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. We pay Brights to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Outfit. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

ICE CREAM SET.

12 Plates and Tray (13 Pieces)

Handsomely
Decorated, $4.85

A Substantial and Enduring Christmas Gift.

DESIGNED in green floriage, or can be had in a pleasing brown, blue, and green design, or in an exquisite brown tone with blue violets for garnishing.
Other choice novelties in Crockery, China,
Glass and Silverware for the HOLIDAYS.

ABRAM FRENCH COMPANY,
89-95 Franklin St., Boston, Mass.
Safe Carriage Guaranteed.

DURKEE'S SPICES
THE WELL KNOWN "GAUNTLET BRAND"
EXCEL IN PURITY, STRENGTH & FLAVOR.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.
ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has indorsed thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors.
Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

EBBITT HOUSE,

WASHINGTON, D.C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Popular Prices. Regular rate $4.00 per day up.
Fifty rooms on the sixth floor, with steam heat and electric light, reduced to $2.50 and 3.00 per day.
Fifty rooms on other floors reduced from $4.00 to $3.50 per day. Parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates. Special rates for the Army and Navy Officers and the Clergy.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement.
Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building.

BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES
of Copper and Tin
BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate
Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1895.

NUMBER 49.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Nucleus and Nebula,	797
A Side Issue; A Good Idea; Seeking for Kindred; Octavius Frothingham,	798
MUSINGS,	799
BREVITIES,	799
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
The Carlyle Memorial, London, by J. T. Sunderland; The Women's Armenian Relief Fund, by Mrs. Mary Hickson,	800
Russian Social Life, by Sophie Friedland; The National Conference; Mr. Frothingham's Funeral,	801
Rev. Helen G. Putnam; The Calhoun Settlement; American Unitarian Association,	802
The Existence of God, by Ex-Governor Howard; Echoes of the Conference,	804
Thomas Treadwell Stone, D.D.; The Church's Opportunity,	810
A Tribute to Dr. S. F. Smith; Augustus Woodbury, D.D.,	811
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	802
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	802
LITERATURE.
"The Christ of To-day,"	804
Other Book Notices,	805
Recent Poetry,	806
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Received,	807
THE HOME.
Wanted: A Boy; Canaries,	808
A Change of Meaning; Abraham Lincoln's Peach; Collections; A Queer Corn-popper; Little Pheasants,	809
POETRY.
Only Once,	800
Faith Reborn,	804
To a Simple Housewife,	808
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	810
EDUCATION,	810
SCIENCE,	810
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	811
PLEASANTRIES,	812

SPECIMEN COPIES of the Christian Register will be sent free for four weeks to any one wishing to examine it. Application should be made with address in full to

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Editorial.

THE Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute (Tuskegee, Ala.), of which Booker T. Washington is principal, has just met with the serious loss of its barn by fire. The barn was the largest and best built of any in the State. While the building was insured for two-thirds its value (all that could be secured), the loss of many valuable cows, a large quantity of feed, tools, dairy outfit, etc., falls heavily on the school in the midst of the winter season; and Mr. Washington earnestly asks for help to replace the loss at once. This is the first fire in the history of the institution, and we hope it will kindle the generosity of our readers.

THE church which fails this year, at least, to equal the contribution of last year to the work of the Unitarian Association, is recreant to its duty. There is but one possible excuse for such delinquency, and that is no excuse at all. The church may think, where there is so much new enthusiasm, a little falling-off on its part will not be noted or missed. This is as if the soldier should say that, where there are so many to fight the battle, he might as well retire to sit behind a tree. If the yearly gift does not at first reach the sum justly required of it, each church owes it to its own self-respect, as well as to other churches engaged in the common work, not to rest till the deficiency is made good.

THE economical value of Negro education is suggested when we read in the fourteenth annual report of Mr. Booker T. Washington, as principal of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute in Alabama, that in one community near Tuskegee there are nineteen colored persons who have recently bought land or engaged in buying homes. This shows a determination not to solve the so-called Negro question by going off to Africa or to any other part of the country, but by settling down in the South and laying the basis of industrial and social prosperity. This means not only gain for the Negro, but a gain for every Southern State whose industries they help to develop. It means the growth of Southern trade, but it represents a moral as certainly as an economical force. The qualities which help to produce thrift in the Negro, wrought out as they are by good, honest, productive labor, mean self-command, respect for property, and social order.

MR. G. E. MORRISON has written an extremely interesting narrative of his journey across China, in which he has much to say of the missionaries. His testimony to the moral excellence of these men and their pure devotion to their work should set at rest all doubts of their fitness on this score to represent Christianity in the East. Unhappily, his impressions of their intellectual capacity are not so satisfactory. He quotes one as saying, "Those Chinese who have never heard the gospel will be judged by the Almighty as he sees fit." In other words, there may be some hope for them. "But those Chinese who have heard the Christian doctrine and still steel their hearts against the Holy Ghost will assuredly go to hell." By his own showing he had saved six "dubious converts," and had destroyed the last hope of some hundreds or thousands more, who might have been better off if they had never been offered the chance he set before them. He was himself apparently too dull to see this point; but Mr. Morrison has a quiet laugh over the "equanimity with which this good man contemplates his work in China."

ALL this enables us to mark the contrast between the ordinary mission and the work which Unitarians have undertaken in Japan. No attempt is there made at formal conversion. The aim is simply to put into Japanese thought and life whatever can be communicated from our own stream of belief and hope and endeavor. There is no question of saving souls from eternal torment, but there is the opportunity for making a contribution to the spiritual life of Japan which will set its mark on the national character. Already there is plenty of evidence that no other mission has succeeded so well in getting the attention of the more intelligent portion of the native mind. It has set in motion currents of thought which are certain to make themselves felt throughout the literature of the country, and must inevitably help to determine the religious future of that people.

WE question whether the Journal of Education can establish its statement that "journalism has its code of ethics as well defined as has any other profession." One may obtain very definite ideas of what the code of ethics is in medicine, the law, or the ministry; but we should like to know just what the code of journalistic ethics is. It would be hard to formulate its principles if one were to deduce them from the practice of many journals. We are inclined to think that one of the misfortunes of journalism lies right there,—that it has no well-established professional code of ethics. If it had, there would be less need for the Journal of Education to say: "It is not good journalistic 'form' to deal editorially with the private life or strictly personal characteristics of any man, whatever his official position or whatever his attitude on public measures. The fact that a man is in public life gives the editorial pen no privileges with his unrelated private life, no right to wound his feelings needlessly."

LYNCHING would be bad enough if it always killed the right man; for it is barbaric to add fiendish cruelty to the penalty of death, and it helps to brutalize the community that inflicts or permits it. But the indictment which must be read again and again against lynching is that it often kills the wrong man. Indeed, the probability is that two innocent men are killed to every one whom the law would judge guilty. In Texas last week a mob hanged a Negro who was accused of having driven over a little white girl in the road. After the Negro was dead, the lynchers discovered that they had killed the wrong man, and that the man who had run over the child had made good his escape. This only shows that the outrage of lynching is one that is not committed merely against the Negro as an individual, but against his race. The murderer may go free; but, as long as some other Negro is killed, the mob's thirst for blood seems to be satisfied.

ONE of the things which renders modern Spiritualism so suspicious to an investigator is that it literally loves darkness rather than light. And we are glad to find in the Philosophical Journal of Chicago, the ablest and best of the journalistic exponents of Spiritualism, writing against the practice of holding dark circles. It quotes a letter from Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten, a veteran Spiritualist lecturer, who says that, for the first years of the Spiritualist movement in America, not a single dark circle was held. Home, one of the most prominent of Spiritualists, held his séances in the light under conditions admitting of observation and verification. The editor of the Philosophical Journal says: "We have attended a number of dark circles in pursuing the investigation of the phenomena of Spiritualism. They never made any impression upon our mind, for the reason that there were present the conditions of possible fraud; and there was no opportunity to observe or prove anything where observation and proof were all-important,—indeed, absolutely necessary,—in order to make the tests of evidential value."

IN an article in the December Forum on "The Pilgrim Principle and the Pilgrim Heritage" President Hyde of Bowdoin College presents a table giving the results of a recent canvass of a portion of Plymouth County, Mass., in which the religious preferences and habits of church attendance of 5,875 families are given. His conclusion is that the Congregationalists have retained but little more than one-fifth of these families. By Congregationalists President Hyde means simply the Trinitarian branch of that body. Hence his conclusions as to how far the Pilgrim principle is adhered to in Plymouth County, judged by the form of church government, is wide of the mark. Strangely enough, in this calculation, the large town of Plymouth, where the Pilgrims settled, is altogether left out of account, together with the church which is the historical and spiritual heir of the Plymouth settlement. But, taking the towns represented, when we add the percentage of Unitarians and Baptists and Universalists, we find the number of Congregationalists represented to be forty-four and a half per cent. instead of twenty-one per cent., as given by Prof. Hyde; while there are seventeen per cent. whose religious preferences are not given. Thus the showing for Congregationalism and the Pilgrim heritage is by no means so bad as the article makes it.

NUCLEUS AND NEBULA.

THERE are certain nebulous collections of matter floating between the earth and the depths of infinite space. They are believed to be the stuff of which the worlds are made. To the astronomer they reveal various stages of condensation in the process of world-making. Among them there are clouds of matter which seem to have no central points of attraction. They are merely clouds of matter floating in space like the clouds which float in our upper air. Their destiny is to be absorbed. In other nebulae the careful observer may sometimes note several points toward which matter seems to be attracted. As the process of condensation goes on about these several points, the destiny of the nebula is to break up into several clouds, which will finally become solid bodies, and will be attracted into well-established systems, and there join other planets, fall into some central sun, or perhaps become a comet or an asteroid with a regular orbit. The third and most interesting class of nebulae is that in which a central point of attraction has been established, about which begins to revolve the nebulous mass which surrounds it. The destiny of this nebula is to become a solar system, with a central sun, surrounded by its attendant planets and satellites.

NOW these three forms of matter and motion have each, in turn, at some time in its history, seemed to be a symbol of the history and the fortunes of Unitarianism. Sometimes it has seemed to be designed to remain in an inchoate state. Sometimes it has seemed probable that it would break up into independent bodies, which would finally swing off under the influence of some strong attraction. But, last of all, it seems to have entered upon the state of real creation, with a definite and desirable destiny in sight.

A compact, coherent, and workable church organization can be made in two ways, by external compulsion or by internal attraction. Since the Conferences at Saratoga and Washington, it appears to many who have a wide outlook as if at last a central attraction was realized. We have passed from all declarations concerning persons and personal authority to a central declaration concerning the principles of life. The attraction is from the centre. If there be any part of the nebulous matter surrounding that centre which is too far away to feel the central pull, such remote parts will drift into space until some other power lays its grip upon them.

NOW a word as to the relations of nucleus and nebula. The nucleus in every club, church, conference, and other organization of benevolence and religion will consist, first of all, of the principles which give the institution a right to be. Secondly, and of next importance, it is made up of the persons who are loyal to those principles, who are willing to work with them, who take it for granted that it is a part of their common life and duty to maintain these principles, to make them effective not merely in the institutions to which they are loyal, but to the world about them for the welfare of which the institution exists. The persons who constitute this nucleus, instead of regarding it as a hardship that upon them come the duty and responsibility of maintaining the constant pull toward the centre, ought to regard it as a position of the highest honor. They ought to rejoice in it, and, without any regard to the gratitude or ingratitude of those upon whom they work, should look to the end to be gained by the exertion of influence. Comparatively a few must constitute the nucleus; but, they being faithful, the nucleus grows, the central attraction increases, the new world begins to shape itself.

There are many signs that throughout our body the central attraction is felt in a new way. Old churches, of which it had been said "the iron of conventionality has entered their souls," feel the thrill of a new life. Men and women who have been repelled by every form of ecclesiastical authority feel the attraction of a simple principle which seems to be ultimate and central; namely, love as an ideal for the conduct of life,—love to God as its highest aim, and love to man as its final duty.

Some cannot see the difference between declaring loyalty to the person of Jesus and loyalty to the religion of Jesus; but the difference is great. To some it is vital. Kepler, the great astronomer, discovered certain laws of planetary motion. They have ever since been called Kepler's laws. The majority of men who accept the laws accept them on the authority of Kepler. They believe the laws because Kepler stated them. But others, who have verified the laws by independent calculation, believe in Kepler because he revealed the laws. The acceptance of the truth includes both forms of belief and loyalty.

The idea which has been entertained by some people, both within and without the Unitarian ranks, that other and stronger attractions were to lay hold upon the materials of which our body is composed, seems to have passed away almost instantaneously. The most serious criticism that comes to us appears in the charge of a too ardent "Unitarianism." This charge comes from one who does not feel the pull of the central attraction, and cannot understand what it is that has transformed many who had been (whether indifferent or interested) merely spectators of our work into ardent advocates and supporters. Shall this new wave of unanimity and enthusiasm be merely a wave, or shall it be a strong current, flowing on with increasing volume? The most serious question which we have heard asked ought now to come home to every one, Are our people worthy to stand before the world as the representatives of the great declarations they have made? To set up a high ideal is to invite condemnation unless the common life is seen to be rising to the level of that ideal. In this way, and in this way only, is our Church on trial before the world.

A SIDE ISSUE.

The changes in our ideals of education which have been taking place for many years show themselves in almost every department of study, from the university to the reading class of half a dozen girls who meet to compare notes on some subject of mutual interest. The college education, which consisted in reading Greek and Latin through the years of boyhood and early manhood, and then never reading it again, has been rightfully laughed out of countenance as the exclusive training for culture; and to-day there are a multiplicity of scientific courses in our universities, as well as manual training schools, and numberless facilities for all kinds of practical study, designed to bring certain and speedy rewards of success. This is true in the education of women no less than in that of men. Our college graduates have distinguished themselves in the establishment of cooking-schools, and our clubs forsake the study of Dante and Emerson for lectures on sanitation and hygiene.

It is no wonder that these advanced studies of domestic science have appealed strongly to women, and are likely to interest them more and more. The possession of a housekeeping conscience is a distinction to which every genuine New England housekeeper can lay legitimate claim. It has descended to her from the days when her great-grandmothers used to hold the kitchen as their domain, and when they wove cloth and made cheeses and skimmed bayberry-wax for candles. It is true that certain daughters of the soil may transfer their homes and affections to New York or Chicago, as Mrs. Rollins has done, for instance, whose recent article, "How to make Home Happy," has at least set people thinking; and they may discover, as she has done, that sometimes the same ends may be accomplished by the use of different means. But, commonly speaking, the real

New England housekeeper's conscience widens slowly, and is warranted against unproved innovations.

While her conscience, however, has lost little of its early dominance, the outward conditions which affect it have gradually changed; and the housekeeper grapples with difficulties more complex and elusive than those which her grandmothers knew. She may not knead her dough with her own hands; but there are unmistakable indications that she is no longer permitted to remain in ignorance of the chemical changes it must undergo before its reappearance in light, crusty loaves, and she must understand its proper relation to the meats and vegetables with which she is planning to bring her children to the exact height and weight she considers desirable. She must understand the chemistry of foods, and know how to calculate dietaries. Courses of lectures on food economics and domestic science are presented to her as absolute necessities of common education, offered like pills, and warranted to cure the evil tendencies of the hearers. She is considered not quite womanly unless she knows all about hypophosphites; and even the advertisements hurl at her the reproachful question, "How often does your butcher wash his meat-cutter?" until it stands to her as a symbol of all the things she ought to know and doesn't.

This new and general interest in matters vitally connected with our well-being is a healthy and promising sign of advance, and yet it is inevitable that we should find the same tendency to superficiality and incompleteness in practical studies as in the study of philosophy or ancient history. It is a little discouraging to look over the courses of work offered by the programmes of our women's clubs, and observe how rarely they indicate individual work or concentration of thought. More women study in these days, and they study in many new directions; but they have not as yet settled down to methods that promise the best results. Lectures often demand little more from the individual than the ability to pay the fee and listen to what somebody else has found out. It is just as true to-day as ever it was that there is not much gain where knowledge obtained is not put to use, and where no pains are taken with it. The increase of the lecture habit almost leads one to believe that fewer women care for immediate contact with books than before the general wide-spread diffusion of general knowledge. Women's clubs are certainly a step upward; but they will prove to be not an end in themselves so much as a help to the something better that must come later. We look back to the days of the old-fashioned reading-class, which still exists, perhaps, in many places, where each member came prepared with a distinct individual contribution to the work of all, and see that it, too, had advantages which ought to be combined with those of the lecture courses now so numerous. We need not forget the classics entirely in our devotion to domestic science; for a judicious combination will be to the advantage of both, and our study, to be really practical, must be so in method as well as in subject.

A GOOD IDEA.

They have in Jamaica Plain a "Fraternal Council," composed of the ministers and representatives of six churches,—the Congregational, Baptist, Methodist, Episcopalian, Universalist, and Unitarian. The council has an excellent agent, who looks up and welcomes strangers and new-comers, and each month reports all such to the church which each may chance to prefer. She also cares for cases of destitution and need. A committee from each church co-operates with the agent, and follows up her reports with personal calls. Three times in each season there is a large social meeting at each of the church parlors in turn, with addresses bearing upon the church work for the community or the city, and with opportunity for friendly acquaintance.

On Thanksgiving Day, under the auspices of the Fraternal Council, a pleasant and largely attended union service was held in the Baptist church, at which all the ministers took part. A collection was taken for a common object,—the local Friendly Society. The Baptist minister preached an earnest sermon on "Christian Citizenship." Would not the idea of the Fraternal Council be a good one to adopt in other places?

SEEKING FOR KINDRED.

I would like to find my mother and two sisters we belonged to a slave owner by the name of Jacob Wootson, he kept a livery stable on Maine street in Richmond, Va. We were separated before the war; my mother's name was Mahalie Wootson, and my two sister's names were Margaret and Marinda. Jacob Wootson had three sons, Randolph, Putnam, and Chesterfield, at the time of our separation I was taken to Harrisburg, Va. The last time I saw my mother she was living on Clay street Richmond, Va in 1863. Any information concerning these parties will be cheerfully received.

So many years have now passed since Abraham Lincoln placed his name to the document that freed the slaves that the present generation cannot in the least appreciate what the separation of families meant in the days of slavery. One has a dim idea that with freedom came all the joys of liberty. It is true that many families that had been sold apart were reunited after the war, when the Negroes wandered back to their old homes. Many, too, found relatives in Washington, which for a long time was the Mecca of the blacks, where they hoped to get a glimpse of their great liberator, "Massa Linkum." But those who never came across papers published by the colored people may be surprised to know that to this day, more than thirty years after their manumission, the Negroes are still seeking their kindred.

A copy of one of these papers lies before us, with more than a column of such advertisements. By far the larger number are for mothers. It is touching to see how men and women, now of middle life, are still longing for their black "mammies." Those who maintain that slaves were rarely sold so far away as to lose all trace of their friends might find in these advertisements proof enough of that frightful cruelty. One writes: "I would like to know the whereabouts of my mother, who was sold from Georgia to Louisiana. When sold, my mother was taken away from her two children, my sister and myself. This separation took place in 1845." Fifty years! and these sisters, now nearly sixty years of age, are still seeking the mother who was lost to them so long ago!

The names of the slave dealers and "Negro Trader" (spelled with capitals) are given in full. Happily, only one is a woman, "Betsie Perison," who sold a mother from Arkansas to a man in Texas. Several have two or three persons mentioned as their owners in succession, showing that they underwent the agony of separation many times. These advertisements make history real, and one might well wish that he could be the means of giving tidings of the lost kindred to those who promise "devout and lasting gratitude" for such intelligence. It seems strange that, in these days of rapid interchange of information, scores of years should elapse without knowing anything definite about friends in the same country; though in most of these cases the silence of death probably hides the story of these old colored men and women.

It is sometimes easier now to get news of one's friends from far-away lands than it was in the early days after the war to hear from neighboring States. The terrible massacres in Turkey have given fresh illustration of this. As one report after another comes of the destruction of villages and the killing or driving away of all the Armenians from a city, the Armenians in this country who have friends in that unhappy empire are harassed with anxiety. The distance is so great, the disturbances are so serious, that, if one had to wait the slow and uncertain mails, it would seem unbearable. But the cable and electricity may bring joy as well as sorrow; and, when a rumor came that many Armenians had been killed in an inland town, and the American consul was asked by cable for a certain family, there was "devout gratitude" when the flash came under the sea, "The A.'s saved."

So, too, the many friends of the American missionaries, who are practically imprisoned in that blood-steeped land, have sought and found their kindred by means of the cable, and are rejoicing that they still live.

But there is many a one whom fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters mourn, to whose eyes can come no advertisement, for whom no telegraph can appeal. They are in dreary Siberian exile, in Algerian galleys, or on the oases of Sahara. The family group will never be reunited, and no word can come from them any more than if they were on the other side of the grave.

It may be sad that the ex-slaves should never be reunited in the home circles where they originally belonged. But, at least, these wandering ones, if still living, have comparative freedom and happiness wherever they may be; while the exile and the hunted Eastern Christian have neither. Much as there may be to deplore in our own land, grave as are the evils which should be remedied, there is yet room for deep gratitude in the fact that homes need no longer be broken by slavery nor made desolate by the sword.

OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM.

With Octavius Frothingham's death passes away the most brilliant and interesting figure—excepting one—of those who were the younger liberal leaders of the last generation. His services to our common life of thought were so many and his contribution to it was so rich that it is not easy, at first glance, to fix upon a point of view for seeing it as a whole. Happily, he has given us the hint of what we seek in the title of the hymn written for his graduation from the Divinity School,—that by which most of us, it is likely, know him best, "The Soldiers of the Cross." That militant phrase strikes the key-note which seems most readily to bring that instrument of many strings into clear harmony. The invocation it addresses to the Almighty is that valiant Hebrew one, "Thou Lord of hosts." The hymn itself is the very finest idealized conception of the holy war that summons the faithful and brave. Its imagery is of the arming, the vigil, and the vow of a young knight, to whom the crusade he embarks in is a glorious thing, for the joy of conflict it offers, no less than for the nobility of the cause it fights for. And, then, the proud humility of the knightly temper! for, with all his militant quality, no one ever saw or listened to our friend without being chiefly impressed by the knight, not the mere soldier, that was in him,—the consecration of an austere vow, the sweetness and courtesy of a perfect gentleman.

In his eight years at Salem, we who knew him at a little distance thought of him, perhaps, as one especially fitted for the thoughtful, refined, and cultivated companionship which is easiest found—by a stranger, at least—in little provincial capitals where life has already grown mellow, and is even, it may be, slightly touched in spots with gray. It is probable, however, that these were not merely years of preparation for the wider, noisier field, but that just then his mind more craved solitary study than many companions in his thought. Among his clear-cut recollections of one who was the best of companions, John Weiss, he speaks of that goodly fellowship known to the initiated of that day as the "Hook and Ladder,"—an association of something less than twenty, which included such names as Dr. Hedge, Starr King, William Green, Charles Brooks, John Ware, Charles Brigham, Thomas Stone, Dexter Clapp, George Briggs, Nathaniel Hall, John Merrick, and (I think) David Wasson, of whom only three remain. But, if I can trust my memory here, what he appeared to seek in it was personal acquaintance rather than discussion of opinion. It is as a cheery and bright presence I recall him, as one who seems in the retrospect during those years to have held his forces in reserve.

It had something, accordingly, like the ring of a declaration of independence, or the manifesto of a fresh career, when we heard that the wave of the anti-slavery conflict had reached him in those troubled days, lifted him from his moorings in that quiet haven, and set him afloat upon a wider and lonelier voyage. In the five years that followed, of his residence in Jersey City, he sometimes gave expression to a somewhat forlorn sense of solitude, as if he either did not find the field of work congenial, or else had come to feel that no constructive and satisfying outside work was to be done in it, so that it is easy to imagine that the experience was something like an experience of exile. Still, they were years possibly the most needed and fruitful of all, to save him (if ever there were danger) from growing into a mere man of letters or a mere platform orator,— years that made him, instead, a consecrated scholar, a well-equipped as well as eloquent interpreter of advancing thought in many of its higher ranges. Of the evidences of this growth, among the first and ablest was his exposition, in 1858, of the great critical work of Baur, which gave the earliest clear indication of the ground he held firmly, ever after, in the disputed province of historical criticism. Here, too, in a series of noteworthy papers, he first proved his mastery of the extraordinary fluency, ease, vigor, and brilliant touch which marked his literary handling of topics that in most men's hands lie quite outside the pale of literature.

The large opportunity of his life and the full assertion of his powers came with his removal to New York in 1860. The story of his work here should be told by some one who knew face to face this remarkable group in which he was the chosen leader, and could report first-hand of a movement that will be better understood and more significant as years go by. The personal qualities he brought to bear in it were described by Mr. Chadwick in well-chosen words in the funeral address. I venture to add to this estimate only a few points suggested to me at a much greater distance; for during those years I saw little of Mr. Frothingham personally, and heard only a single address of his in the actual scene of his ministration. It was such an address as he is well known to have been a master in,—clear, ready, self-possessed, carefully studied, but extemporaneous in delivery, forcible, but not impassioned or in the least declamatory, rather broad than vehement or especially vigorous in grasp, about an hour in length, in substance an exposition of what Comte's "Religion of Humanity" really means, at once comprehensive, critical, and sympathetic. It seemed to imply a movement of positive or constructive rather than merely critical theology, and in this view was perhaps a fair example of his ordinary address. If so, it was quite too purely intellectual, too destitute of appeal to feeling or even to imagination to more than hint, in the range of practice, the possibilities of a far-off future. It might even react, in some minds, toward a certain despondency and sense of helplessness. I wrote to him once, expressing somewhat warmly my appreciation of what he was doing and his own quality as a leader in such high paths; and the first words of his reply were, "What good angel inspired you just then to write just that letter?" implying that it had helped lift him out of a black pit of self-distrust and sense of failure. The "thin sheet of ice," he lamented to his friend Chadwick, was too effective a non-conductor to the rays of common sympathy.

It was very likely some expression of this feeling that led to the report when he left New York that he confessed his effort there to be a failure, even if he did not react into a conservative shrinking from it as something false and wrong. There is no reason whatever to suppose that his mind as to these matters was altered in the least. Of course, he understood that the period he worked in was a "drift period in theology,"—a phrase (by the way) sent him, as title and text, by the then editor of the Christian Examiner, and wrought by him into one of his most characteristic essays; and, naturally enough, a drift period is not just the time to find firm standing-ground. But it sets its own preparatory task, nevertheless. And that task, in his hands, was honestly and ably done, not needing (we may hope) to be repeated; while the conviction that it had to be done may well have deepened the sense of weariness that comes in looking back on the patiently trodden way. It may, too, have deepened the grateful sense of relief and repose with which one reverts, at sixty, to tasks more quiet and genial, better suited to his advancing years than to those when he courted the stress of battle. To the wearied soldier the furlough was well earned.

The work of these later years speaks pleasantly for itself. The wonder was that the hand we thought tired out was still so diligent, deft, and swift; that the faculty we feared was permanently lamed was still so prompt and adequate to whatever might be required. I had occasion once to suggest his name as biographer and editor of the unfinished record left by our dearly honored friend, David Wasson, not knowing that he was (probably) the one living man competent to that task. Such a memorial as that, or as the Life of William Channing; such a pair of thick, genial, and readable volumes as those which tell his recollections of Boston Unitarianism and Unitarians; such a series of papers as those appearing within these years, giving no hint that they were years of partial retirement and frequent invalidism,—these might well make an ample record of a literary life in its best noontide, not in its lingering afternoon.

A word might here be said to tell how good and how pleasant was the companionship of these later years. And this word might include mention of a trait which his friends have noted with perhaps as much admiration as any achievement of his robust years,—the untiring and perfect courtesy of his presiding, through many an hour that must have been unspeakably weary, in sessions of the Free Religious Association, whose very title seems to invite what is most formless and weary of all modes of human speech. If any such quality ever did appear in those debates, I am sure that no one could have been more keenly sensitive of it than he, though that fine dissimulation let no one else suspect it. For his judgment of persons as well of things was swift, keen, inevitable. By that bright rapier the dearest friend or the dearest foe was sure to be touched in the one vulnerable spot. No emotional heat ever spoiled the temper of his shining blade or warped its straightforward thrust.

J. H. A.

Musings.

THERE is a time, said the Preacher, for everything,—“a time to weep and a time to laugh, a time to mourn and a time to dance, a time to keep silence and a time to speak, a time to cast stones and a time to gather them together.” In these days the newspaper is supposed to be nothing if not timely. The timely article is the one an editor is always looking for, and always trying to write. I have been impressed with the timeliness, fitness, and strength of the editorials in the Boston Transcript on the Armenian question. They have said the right thing in the right way. They have been intelligent, just, and sympathetic. On the other hand, I was impressed last week with the decided untimeliness of some paragraphs written by "Listener," a regular contributor to the same paper, who seemed to assume that it was "a time to cast stones," and to cast them at the bruised and beaten Armenians. Bad as the priest and the Levite were in passing by on the other side, they did not, at least, throw any stones at the wounded man. There are a sufficient number of indifferent people who pass by the down-trodden Armenians. But, as long as they do not cast stones or javelins, they are not adding to the acuteness of these wounds. The stone that "Listener" throws is one that has been used by Marion Crawford and Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith and others, who look at the struggle in the East through the eye-glasses of a cool dilettanteism. It is the proverbial reproach that an Armenian is tricky in trade, and cannot be depended upon to speak the truth. Whether this wholesale characterization of the race be true or not, it is the weakest sort of apology for murder, destruction, and rapine. I do not mean that any of these gentlemen would justify these barbarities. I am not accusing them of inhumanity, but simply pointing to a cold, critical dilettanteism which, looking toward Armenia, where rivers of blood are running and the cries of widows and orphans are raised to heaven, and the world is shuddering with horror at this butchery, can, instead of a word of ringing protest and heartfelt sympathy, fling an old Oriental diatribe, which has come out of the conflicts of races in the East: "The Armenian,—well, he does not tell the truth, you know; and he is sharp in trade. He is competent enough to look out for number one."

It is a curious thing to find literary men adopting the proverbs which tradesmen have hurled at each other the world over, and which have been applied to half a dozen different races. This and many other reproaches have been hurled at the Jews, and it has been repeatedly applied to the Greeks. English tradesmen have succeeded in getting the term "Greek" into the English language as a synonyme of a cunning knave. I remember that the correspondent of an English paper in Italy poured out the most violent denunciation of the Greeks; and an English tradesman went so far as to say to me that he never found one whom he could trust. Yet, after living among the Greek people for six months, in closer relations than this superior Englishman would accept, I reached the conclusion that the Greeks were not a nation of liars and thieves; and, with no more precaution, my personal property appeared to be as safe in Athens as in London. Some of the grandest men and women I have met anywhere were those I met in Greece. Imagine Byron, or that noble lover of liberty whom Greece holds in everlasting remembrance, Dr. Samuel G. Howe, in the sad, bloody days when Greece was suffering under the Turkish yoke, putting on a pair of eye-glasses, and saying: "They are sharp at a bargain,—these Greeks,—and can't be depended on to tell the truth. I think we can safely leave them to take care of themselves." I would just as soon expect William Lloyd Garrison, after reading an account of a lynching in the South, to write an article for the Transcript, and say, "Well, you know the Negro will lie, and will visit hen-roosts."

I HAVE travelled enough over the world to distrust a good deal the wholesale proverbial characterization of races, especially when it has sprung from the fierce competitions of business. In the East no one expects to do business without haggling. The buyer always expects to beat down, and the seller to abate some of his price, if he must, though he yields only inch by inch. Occidental traders have not the highest opinion of Oriental veracity; and I have found, also, that the Orientals have not a high opinion of Occidental brow-beaters. I have found that those English who dislike the Greeks are just as heartily disliked in return, and with just as much reason. I have come to feel that race hatred is, after all, among the most detestable things in the world. I have been in Constantinople, and travelled in Asia Minor under the escort of a potent Turkish cavalryman. I have been out on the "Sweet Waters," and seen thousands of Turks enjoying their Friday afternoon holiday in quietude, and have been struck with the spectacle of domestic affection and filial love; and I am sure that, if an irresponsible and despotic government of Christians were to loot, burn, murder, and ravage the Turks simply because they were Mohammedans, I should want to raise my voice against such cruelty and oppression. The old race hatreds still persist, and it will be long before they yield to the deeper kinship of our common humanity. But it is not a matter of race hatred, but a simple fact of common experience and observation, that Turkey is one of the worst governed countries in the world, and that its standards of justice and humanity are those of a past age.

"LISTENER" must be careful how he flings his charge of sharpness in trade against the Armenians. The Yankee must speak with reserve on this subject. If the word "Greek" has been unjustly dragged into the English dictionary as a synonyme for a crafty rogue, he will see, on turning to the Century Dictionary, that New England has made a distinct contribution to the language of hypocrisy. The word "deacon" is used as a verb, and one of its meanings in the United States is thus described:—

To arrange so as to present a specious and attractive appearance; present the best and largest specimens (of fruit or vegetables) to view, and conceal the defective ones: as, to deacon strawberries or apples. (Slang, U.S.) This sense contains a humorous allusion to the thrifty habits ascribed to the rural New England deacons. Hence: to sophisticate; adulterate; "doctor": as, to deacon wine or other liquors. (Slang.) "Deaconed veal," veal unfit for use, as when killed too young. (Connecticut.)

Prof. Whitney lived in New England, and cannot be accused of any race hatred in this definition, which is a description of fraud joined with hypocrisy. If, now, some Armenian daily paper jumps to the conclusion that the Yankees are all hypocrites and frauds, and capable of taking care of number one, it will be doing what superficial observers are apt to do,—draw a wholesale conclusion from a few retail facts. Surely, New England must look out for its reputation. As for the Armenians, one of the most sublime things in their record, which has marked them all the way down from the earliest centuries of their Christian history, is their unflinching devotion to their convictions of the truth. If they had only been willing to be hypocrites, and renounce their religion, they would have been spared over and over again. And now, if they would only embrace Mohammedanism against all their convictions of truth and duty, they would be spared the terrible anguish of seeing their little ones murdered before their eyes, their homes burned, their husbands and fathers killed or cast into prison or forced into exile. To ignore this heroic element in their history and their sublime devotion to their religion is as if a newspaper paragraph, in referring to the character and the history of the Puritans, should forget their magnificent struggle for liberty and their grand devotion to their convictions, and should flippantly sum it all up in a sentence,—“Oh, yes, they knew how to put their best apples on the top of the barrel.”

Brevities.

Once Columbus was said to have discovered America; but now, according to the St. Louis Christian Advocate, he discovered turtle-soup.

Dr. S. F. Smith could ask for no better monument than that which he has written in every hymn-book in the land, and which is sung without regard to race or creed.

The Queen of Italy means to travel on a gold basis. She has received the present of the most costly bicycle in the world, the wheels of which "are of pure gold." But we suspect that the Pope of bicycles, not the pope of Italy, would recommend some other material, such as is used in the bicycle named after Christopher Columbus.

The sad intelligence of the death of Rev. Helen G. Putnam has been received from Fargo, No. Dak. The word was not wholly unexpected, because we had heard of her serious illness. With characteristic devotion, she had begun to take up her work before she was out of the sick-room; and our last tidings from her came through her nurse, who wrote in her behalf, with reference to the Alliance. Miss Putnam won warm friends in Boston when she was at the head of the "Country Week" here, and she has increased the number by her self-sacrificing efforts for humanity ever since. Her genial presence and cordial word will be sorely missed in many a home.

Gov. Greenhalge of Massachusetts has evidently not the fear of the A. P. A. before his eyes; for he has just appointed Dr. Mary V. O'Callaghan of Worcester, Mass., to the vacancy on the Massachusetts Prison Commission caused by the resignation of Miss Katherine E. Conway. But, in doing this, he is simply following precedent; for Miss Emma Forbes Cary, who served the board with great faithfulness and ability, was a Catholic, and Miss Conway, also. Dr. O'Callaghan was born in Worcester, graduated at the high school and normal school, and taught in the public schools before beginning her career as a doctor. She is a graduate of the Woman's Medical College in Philadelphia.

The Congregationalist, referring to Dr. Gordon's sermon before the American Board, says: "It is no more wise to attempt to Americanize Oriental converts to Christianity than it was in Paul's time to Judaize them. Their literature, their morality, their religion, have much in them of value to the world; and it is our business not to destroy these things, but to discover what is precious to mankind in Japan, China, and other nations, and to infuse into it the spirit of Christ. Do we assume that God in his providence has wrought nothing good in all the history of these lands,—that he has neglected them all in his absorbing interest in Christian Europe and the United States? Is there nothing in them worthy to be assimilated into Christianity? Is it not the mission of Christianity to take up into itself the wealth of thought, of devotion, of achievement in the Orient, and thus to show itself in greater splendor, as the gospel of redeeming grace, the supreme gift of God to all mankind?" It is on this principle that the Unitarian mission in Japan has been conducted.

ONLY ONCE.

Through this toilsome world, alas!
Once and only once I pass.
If a kindness I may show,
If a good deed I may do
To my suffering fellow-men,
Let me do it while I can,
Nor delay it; for 'tis plain
I shall not pass this way again.

—Joseph A. Torrey.

THE CARLYLE MEMORIAL, LONDON.

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

Late in the year 1894 a scheme was set on foot among the admirers of Carlyle to preserve permanently, as a memorial of the great historian, essayist, and censor of his time, this place, where he had lived and worked for more than forty years. On the 22d of last July the influential committee appointed to raise £3,500 for this purpose issued a circular, announcing that they had secured subscriptions to the amount of somewhat more than £2,000, and on the basis of this had bought the house, put it as nearly as possible in the condition in which it was when occupied by the Carlyles, and that they would open the place to the public on July 26. It was the good fortune of the writer of this to be present on that day.

It was particularly fitting that the house should be opened during the present year,—the one hundredth since Carlyle's birth. It is proposed to mark the exact centenary (December 4) by a fitting celebration; and it is earnestly hoped that by that time the full sum asked for by the committee will have been secured.

Chelsea is an interesting part of London, situated on the Thames, perhaps six or seven miles below the Parliament Houses and Westminster Abbey. Cheyne Row (pronounced Chaney Row) leads back directly from the river bank; and a walk of a minute or two brings one to the spot sought. The house has a plain front of dark brick, and there is nothing particular to distinguish it from others in the row of which it is a part. Carlyle seems to have chosen the house as much as anything because he could get it cheap; for, when he came here in 1834, his purse was painfully light, and he could rent the place for £35 a year.

Let us enter. A dozen persons have arrived before us. The custodian receives us, and shows us through the various rooms and garden. One of the secretaries of the Memorial Committee is also present to welcome us.

The entrance hall leads straight through the house. From it we pass through a door on the left into the dining-room, or ascend by a rather handsome carved-oak stairway to the stories above. At the rear we pass down by stairs into the kitchen and the garden.

The kitchen is half beneath ground, yet well lighted. Here is a large fireplace and an old-fashioned range, on which the Carlyles did all their cooking. We do not wonder that, with such cooking appliances, poor Mrs. Carlyle found it hard work to humor sufficiently her husband's dyspepsia.

The dining-room occupies the front of the first story. There is a grate with a white marble mantel, a brass fender, and bright steel shovel, tongs, and poker. The other Carlyle furniture in the room is a large, round oak table, a lounge covered with red cloth, and two silver candlesticks.

Ascending the hall stairs, we come to the drawing-room, which occupies the whole front of the house, its size being, perhaps, eighteen by twenty-two feet. The paper on the wall is a reproduction of that of the old Carlyle days. In the centre of the room is an oval oak table, before the open grate is a richly wrought fire-screen, on the mantel are two more silver candlesticks, and on one side is a large bookcase half full of books from Carlyle's library. Several pictures are on the wall,—one an etching of Carlyle sitting in his large arm-chair, in his dressing-gown, smoking a long pipe, one an etching of him in his garden, reading, his hat on, his cat standing behind his chair, and one a very lifelike representation of him on horseback, riding his "Fritz."

In this room Carlyle died, he having been brought down here for his last days because the place was larger and sunnier than his room above. In this room Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle met, for forty years, the greatest literary men of Europe and the world, who eagerly came here to pay homage to the intellectual king of his time. Here or in the garden took place those conversations which were events of a lifetime to those who were privileged to have part in them,—conversations which, as the years went on, tended more and more to become monologues, but such monologues that those who heard could never forget them, or get quite away, however long the years, from the spell of their memory.

Back of the drawing-room is the small apartment which was Mrs. Carlyle's room. It was here that that impetuous, radiant, sensitive spirit thought and dreamed and loved and acutely suffered. To this room, on the fatal 21st of April, 1866, her lifeless form was brought from the carriage in which her driver had found her sitting, dead. It was here, in those later years of his loneliness, that her husband poured out some of his bitterest tears of regret over his thoughtless neglect and selfish absorption.

The room is painted a delicate cream color, as in the old time; but it is as yet without furniture or other memento of its former occupant except a handsome dark mahogany corner bracket, or small cupboard.

Ascending to the third story, we find in front the "spare room," in which Emerson slept (now occupied by the custodian of the house), and in its rear Carlyle's bedroom. Here he was taken sick, and remained until removed to the parlor. As we enter the room, we see Carlyle's tall, four-post, dark oak bedstead, surrounded by the red damask curtains which guarded his uneasy slumbers. Beside the bed is his five-drawered, cherry dressing-bureau. In the little dressing-room back is his marble-top wash-stand, his wash-bowl of old blue ware, a small, plain table painted blue, and his tin bath-tub. Perhaps most interesting of all, under a glass dome stands Carlyle's tall, old-fashioned silk hat, in a good state of preservation; while on the floor is his leather hat-box, in which he had brought the stiff and hated thing from Paris, as we can see by the label still on the box, marked "Paris à Londres, Charing Cross, via Folkestone, 251."

One more flight of stairs, and we are in that "sublime garret, double-doored, double-windowed, impervious to sound," in which Carlyle went through his tremendous wrestle with the "Frederick."

When Carlyle first took the house in 1834, the garret was too low and small to be of much use. In 1853 he had the roof lifted, and the present spacious room finished off. To make sure that all neighborhood noises would be shut out, he determined to have no side windows except two opening through closets. But the room was a failure. It was too large to be warmed in cold weather by its one open grate. The window in the roof let in abundant light; but it also let in so much heat in summer that they tell ludicrous stories of the frantic student sprinkling the floor with the watering-pot to keep the place tolerable, and at last flying in wrath to the garden to escape his torment. The only furniture now in the room is the arm-chair in which Carlyle wrote his great history. On the wall are two well-worn maps of Scotland and Ireland, and old pictures of Goethe, Schiller, Voltaire, and other persons of less note.

We have now seen all except the garden. It is as wide as the house, and about seventy or eighty feet deep. As we enter it from the back hall door, we come first to a small paved court, beyond which is the small lawn, with remains of old flower-beds, all surrounded, in English fashion, with a high brick wall, partly covered with ivy, grape-vines, and in one place a jessamine that Mrs. Carlyle brought from Scotland and planted with her own hand. Close to the back garden wall is a pathetic little mound with a very small, unlettered stone at its head. It is the grave of the beloved little dog, Nero.

Now we have seen all, and we turn to go. We take a last look about us. What visions arise in our minds! This small garden and this plain house, with nothing external to distinguish them from a thousand others, these well-worn floors, these commonplace walls and ceilings, these old-fashioned fireplaces and articles of furniture and wall prints, and these old books in very common bindings suddenly become transformed and luminous with great associations. Memories that the world will not consent to forget rise and wreath themselves about every object. Are we wrong if we think we hear voices speaking to us as to him of old, "Put off thy shoes from thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground?"

THE WOMEN'S ARMENIAN RELIEF FUND.

BY MRS. MARY HICKSON.

Will you help our cause by letting me tell of the practical work started last summer in Van, Armenia, by the American Mission there, and supported by the Women's Armenian Relief Committee of London, for the help of the starving people of that out-raged and desolate land?

Dr. Grace Kimball, a physician attached to the mission,—with more than four years' experience of the needs of the people,—has opened a labor bureau for the purpose of supplying work to the unhappy inhabitants of the district.

"The plan is to buy wool and cotton, and give it out to the people to be spun, woven, and made up into the various articles of clothing common to the country. The spinners, weavers, and knitters are paid liberally for their work; and, as each allotment of wool is made up, another is given out. The manufactured articles are sold for cash, and the proceeds returned to the fund for the purchase of more wool and a continuance of the work of relief." In this way the people are lifted out of their hopelessness, the danger of pauperism is avoided, and we are told that the money thus contributed goes four times as far and does many times as much good as if given directly to the poor.

It is hard for any save an eye-witness to realize the utter helplessness and want in which a very large proportion of the people now find themselves. Mr. W. Willard Howard, a gentleman connected with Reuter's Agency, who spent some weeks this year in the devastated region, and has embodied his observations in a pamphlet entitled "Starvation in Armenia," from which I have just quoted, adds, "The present condition of the country is much worse than it is reported to be; and, unless substantial assistance be given immediately, hundreds, perhaps thousands, of people, will die of hunger and despair." He adds that the distress is greatest in the vilayets of Van and Bitlis, and continues: "No matter what may be the outcome of the scheme of reform for Armenia, these poor people must have help in its most practical and beneficial form. They do not ask for charity, but for a chance to work. If work can be given them, they can keep themselves in food until this crisis in their wretched lives be past." Mr. Howard emphasizes the fact of the beneficent work done by the labor bureau: "Miss Kimball writes me that she is providing work and food for about one thousand people,—a remarkable showing. I cannot hope to make you understand the need of more help for these wretched creatures, for no one can understand who has not actually visited the interior of the distressed region. I earnestly hope you will persevere in your good work."

The labor bureau is under the inspection of her Majesty's vice-consul at Van, Mr. C. M. Hallward, who in a letter to our committee testifies to the ability of Miss Kimball for the work she has undertaken. She organizes the work, and administers the relief, assisted by Mrs. G. Reynolds, and thus writes to the London committee:

"The scheme works admirably so far, but my ever-present nightmare is bankruptcy. . . . I am perfectly besieged with demands for work. I cannot show myself in the street without being followed by a pitiful crowd. Even to go to my own door means being besieged by the never-failing group of people who often wait from morning till night in the hope of catching me. Oh, they are so wretchedly, hopelessly poor! How do they live?" At the present time Miss Kimball is finding work for nearly five hundred individuals, which, taking the families at an average of four, is probably saving about two thousand people from starvation. The wages paid are a little higher than market value; and respecting this fact Miss Kimball writes, "I hope that the price paid will, if ever prosperity returns to this blighted land, serve to raise the price of labor to nearer its living standard."

In the present state of the country it is too much to expect that the bureau will be self-supporting; and, as a matter of fact, the loss involved has been from five to ten per cent. Now, however, that the long Armenian winter has commenced, and bitter cold is added to bitter hunger, it is thought right, if it can possibly be managed, to give the clothing made to the poor workers instead of selling it elsewhere; and the deficit therefore will be very largely increased. The Armenians give of their poverty what they can spare to their more unhappy brethren; but it is to the Women's Armenian Relief Fund that the mission turns as its chief support, and up to the present time we have been enabled, from the generosity of friends, to forward to them nearly £700. This, however, as will readily be understood, can only serve to stem for a very short time the ocean of suffering that threatens to engulf the unhappy people; and, if the beneficent work is to continue through the winter, and we are to assist in starting other centres of usefulness on the same lines, it is necessary to plead with those who have of this world's goods to spare some little part for their sorrowing and starving brothers and sisters in this far-off land. Can we stand quietly by and see the annihilation of this patient people, whom we are told by Rev. F. D. Greene, so long a Christian worker in Van, "are known as being bright, practical, and moral, and a very important element in the population? They have the distinction of being the first race who accepted Christianity. Their martyr roll has grown with every century, and the fact that Armenian stock exists at all to-day is proof of its wonderful vitality and excellent quality." Since the infamous Bahri Pasha was dismissed, things have been rather better for the people. It was this Vali who said he would like to reduce the country to a "mere geographical province," and ruthlessly imprisoned any one who tried to help the poor. His dismissal was a good object-lesson to other Valis. In a private letter we learn that one of these gentry in a neighboring province paid a propitiatory call on the English consul in the afternoon, and sent him a "huge jam tart" the same evening. Had this gentleman read Charles Lamb's eulogium on jam tart, and did he imagine that all Englishmen loved, with that great wit, the melting combination of flaky pastry and hot jam? What hopes and fears must have centred round that pie, and what a mauvais quart d'heure must the Mary Anne of the kitchen—or her Turkish equivalent—have suffered ere it safely reached its destination! We are sure that this scheme of help must appeal to every practical philanthropist. Mr. Howard tells us that in the village of Van "no fewer than one hundred thousand persons out of a total Armenian population of one hundred and forty-five thousand are actually in want of food." It is probable that that number has been greatly increased; for the cold and damp have driven the country people into the towns, and the amount of suffering is almost incalculable. These sufferers have been virtually condemned to death by cold and hunger, not because they are malefactors or law-breakers, but because they are Christians, are true to the faith for which their fathers suffered and died, and have so incurred the hate of their oppressors, who think they do their God service when they thus torture and kill their Christian fellow-subjects. Their ruler—"the Shadow of God upon Earth," as they call him—rewards the slayer of Christians: witness the case of Bahri Pasha, the infamous Vali of Van, who, in being dismissed from Van on the representations of Sir Philip Currie for cruelty in his province, has, on his arrival at Constantinople, been decorated with the Grand Cordon of the Osmanieh Order, as "a reward for good services."

But I have trespassed long enough on your space, and would only add that, strong as is the tie between coreligionists in every nation, it is not only because these people are Christian that we ask for your help and your pity. It is because they belong, also, to the common brotherhood of humanity, because they are our suffering and sorrowing fellow-creatures, because "fellowship is life, and lack of fellowship is death; and the deeds that ye do on the earth it is for fellowship's sake ye do them."

Our banker is Mr. Francis Baxter of Messrs. Prescott, Dimsdale & Co., 50 Cornhill, E.C.; and our treasurer, Mrs. Madeleine Cole, 93 Trebevir Road, South Kensington. Any donations will be most thankfully received and acknowledged by her or by myself.

6 Pelberton Road, Highbury,
London, N.

RUSSIAN SOCIAL LIFE.

BY SOPHIE FRIEDLAND.

There is no country in the world in which humanity is divided into as many classes as in Russia, each class separated from the other by customs and habits of its own.

Traditions, prejudices, and a strong feeling of conservatism keep the great merchant class in our country almost isolated from the rest of society; and it is only lately that common education has begun to bring its younger members in closer contact with the outer world.

Another class which forms a body of its own is the class of lower government officials, policemen, letter-carriers, scribes, and all those who serve the government at the rate of twenty-five roubles ($12) a month.

Among all the different classes of society there are two, however, which, on account of their characteristics, draw most on our sympathies,—the one the representative of highest culture in our country, our aristocracy; and the other our Russian peasants.

Russian aristocracy is divided into two classes, called la grande et la petite noblesse. To the former belong the nobles of oldest lineage, whose ancestors had boasted of imperial blood in their veins. The second is composed of names which are neither so old nor so illustrious.

Among our aristocrats there are many who are not blessed with earthly fortunes, but I do not believe that there are many who are devoid of a good education. Education in Russia is expensive, as there are no free schools; but the government takes care that the nobility, if ever so poor, shall have the advantages of good instruction. We have in St. Petersburg and Moscow a number of imperial institutes for girls, all under the patronage of the czarina, in which for the amount of four hundred roubles ($200) a year a first-class education, including board and the uniform they have to wear, is given to the daughters of nobles who cannot afford to give their children an education according to their rank. Most of our statesmen have graduated from the Imperial Lyceum and Law School, where they have been educated, fed, and clothed for next to nothing, while the rest of humanity in our country sometimes have to starve in order to pay the expenses of five or six years at the university.

The education of a young aristocrat begins at a very early state; and, although he is always surrounded by foreign tutors and governesses, it is entirely Russian, as it is in most cases superintended by the parents, who impress upon the child that it is his duty some day to serve the government. The girls of the wealthy nobles are mostly educated at home; and formerly it was considered sufficient if a young lady could speak the foreign languages well, draw a little, play the piano, dance gracefully, and sit on a horse with perfect ease. Her own language she spoke incorrectly and could not write at all. Now times have changed; and, although French and English are still heard in society, the prevailing language is the Russian, thanks to Czar Alexander III., who first gave the order to the different schools that more attention should be paid to the culture of the Russian language. For the last ten years it has become the fashion for the daughters of our nobles to receive a thorough training in all scientific subjects, and I know many who have passed their examinations as externes at the university.

The study of foreign languages here is begun in the nursery, usually with a French nurse and an English governess, and is continued until the boy, at the age of thirteen or fourteen, enters the Lyceum or Law School, where it is kept up theoretically as well as practically by the rules of the institute.

For the girl the study of foreign languages is a part of her life; for, even when her education is considered a thing of the past, she still retains her foreign governess (sometimes two or three), whose duty it is to converse with her in a foreign tongue, make her acquainted with the literature of foreign countries, and accompany her wherever she goes, for a young lady of the higher classes is not allowed to walk or drive or see her friends unless it be in the society of her parents or elder brother or her governess, whose title usually changes for that of demoiselle de compagnie. Nowhere is the position of governess, tutor, or even nurse so enviable as in an aristocratic family in Russia. The children are brought up to respect the person who takes charge of them; and, as the parents set the good example, there are few instances in which the governess has not been considered a friend of the family long after her pupils had left the paternal roof.

Conversation in society mostly turns on the best novel, on yesterday's concert, or the new picture on exhibition. Politics are never referred to. People in Russian high life are too near the throne to criticise our government, whatever they think of it. Even when abroad, where they are allowed the liberty of opinion, they consider it a want of tact to criticise the conditions of their country. The winter season in St. Petersburg and Moscow is composed of a long line of social pleasures, and it is said statistically that there are forty balls every evening in the first capital of the czar. Supper is usually served at three o'clock in the morning, and it is in the dining-room that Russian hospitality is most admired. It is said that there are but two drinks in Russia,—“champagne” and “vodka” (whiskey of the worst kind); and both flow in torrents, the one at the table of the aristocrat, the other in the peasant's hut.

We have a great many aristocrats who, not having any private fortune, are entirely dependent on the sum of money which they receive from the government for their services. Rent is so much higher in our capitals, hospitality so much greater, and life in general so much more expensive than in other capitals that a great many of our aristocrats are obliged to live a greater part of the year on their country estates, where there is always a pleasant home, which has been in their family for centuries, waiting for them.

Even the wealthy aristocrat leaves the bad climate of St. Petersburg in April or early in May, and goes to his estate, where he remains, in spite of our early unpleasant autumns, until September or October. Life in the country is delightful, particularly after a long season of gayeties. If the number of servants in the city has only been fifteen, in the country it has increased to twenty; for friends are invited from all parts of the country, and during the hunting season the house, which sometimes contains a hundred rooms, is quite full.

In a country house the lady, in spite of a butler who has been in the family for thirty years, and the many servants, has her hands full. Early in the morning she receives the butler and the cook, to whom she gives her orders for the day. At the breakfast table, contrary to her habits in town, she presides herself; and during the whole day she sees to the comfort of her visitors. If her husband has not been able to leave town, she has to listen to the complaints of the steward, to arrange matters with the peasants, and talk to the head-gardener on flowers, fruit, and vegetable questions.

As the hospital and the physician are often at a great distance from the estate, it is the lady of the manor-house who treats the peasants; and in most cases they have more confidence in her than in any professor. The aristocrats have a great love for the people on their estates, and these people pay them with a lifelong devotion. In some parts of our country the estates are close together, and the hospitality practised on each makes the long stay in the country very pleasant. To every visitor full liberty is given, and the many duties of the hostess permit her to withdraw from her guests as often as she pleases. Altogether, life in the country is simple and unconventional.

A very elaborate dinner table—that is, more than four courses—is considered as vulgar as a showy toilet. The aristocrat in Russia is easily recognized by his simple manners and his way of showing attention to the ladies, which differs entirely from those of the lower classes of society. The aristocrat always kisses the hand of a married woman, who in return kisses him on the forehead. Although our aristocratic women are not as advanced as those of other countries, they are always well educated, well read, and good talkers.

I have heard it said that Russian society is the most immoral in the world. The intercourse between men and women in Russian high life is, perhaps, more free than in other countries; and this may be the reason for so dreadful a reputation. A married woman has the right to receive a gentleman in the absence of her husband, walk with him, or, if he is out of the city, write to him. He is considered her particular friend, with the sanction of her husband. Of course, here, as everywhere, there is many a domestic drama; but, as the Greek Church prohibits divorces, and the Russian aristocrat is too proud to parade his outraged feelings before a court of justice, society is not often shocked in regard to the want of morals. Tolstoi has painted the true Russian character in Mr. Karenine, the husband of the heroine, who suffered martyrdom in order to guard the honor of his name.

St. Petersburg, Russia.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

To the Unitarian Churches of America,
Greeting:—

At the close of the sixteenth meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, it becomes once more the duty of the Council to issue an address to the churches, with the request that it be publicly read.

The meeting at Washington has been a marked success. In point of numbers, in sustained interest, in religious enthusiasm, in the quality and power of its papers and addresses, and in the importance of the work started or accomplished, it ranks with the best that has ever been held, even if it does not stand as our high-water mark. Though something of the social intercourse of Saratoga may have been missed, this loss has been more than balanced by the consideration that we have been speaking to the country, and so have done effective work in proclaiming our gospel in new fields. As never before, we have spoken through the press, and so sent our message all over the land. This seems to us a very important gain over the old times when we spoke only to each other.

The influence of the new declaration, adopted last year at Saratoga, has been felt in a most gratifying way. Many hearts were made happy at the sight of a united body of believers and workers, in which the spirit of cordial fellowship was supreme. The right wing and the left wing, apparently forgetting that they were on opposite sides of the body, remembered only that it was their office to sustain that body in its flight. Perhaps the best thing about the Conference was its series of grand meetings, its strong papers and addresses, the consciousness of its power in impressing the country, and its increasing enthusiasm for the work that waits us; i.e., the total impression of the Conference itself. Some of its special features, however, call for mention. Each day was marked by the unanimous passage of some resolution by which the Conference put itself on record concerning some great question of the time. It declared for such a reform of our municipal administration as should make good government in our cities supreme over all questions of partisan politics. It put itself on record as against the present pressing evils of intemperance. While advocating no narrow views, it pointed out the saloon as the centre of personal, social, and political corruption. It pleaded with humanity in behalf of Armenia, and in favor of religious liberty throughout the world. It reached out its hand in sympathetic fellowship to the Unitarians of Hungary, who for so long have stood for religious freedom in South-eastern Europe. It offered to the world its own basis of love to God and love to man, as a satisfactory formula for religious union. It took the first steps toward a union of all our young people's societies, so as to organize their power and enthusiasm, and bring them into vital relations with the churches and with the religious needs of the time. A special resolution of sympathy with Dr. Edward Everett Hale, and of regret for his enforced absence from the Conference, was unanimously adopted.

The meetings of the Women's Alliance, of the Sunday School Society, and of the subsidiary bodies, show fine work done, and an advance of interest and power all along the line.

The Council would call attention to the fact that, while the Conference is free to use any and all agencies for the carrying on of its missionary work, its main agency is naturally our central and oldest missionary organization, the American Unitarian Association, which was never so well organized and equipped for its work as it is now. With its new, capable, and broad-minded secretary, and with an efficient and experienced business man as treasurer, who is ready to give all his time and enthusiasm to the raising of its money and managing its finances, we ought to give the Association our undivided and hearty support. It is our arm, strong enough to do all the work for which we are ready to furnish the means. The new departure in the organization of the Association is so important that it must have ample time to develop its power and show what it can do.

With a united front, then, let us march on to that victory which means release, liberty, and a higher life for the world. The trend of science, the progress of philosophy, the increase of scholarship, the results of the best criticism, the growth of civilization, all are with us. God is leading and lifting his world into a higher enlightenment and a wider and freer religious life. While awed by the thought that we can co-operate with God to this great end, let us feel the touch of consecration and the thrill of enthusiasm, and so give ourselves as never before to the great work which waits for our accomplishment.

For the Council,

M. J. SAVAGE, Chairman.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S FUNERAL.

The funeral services were held at Mr. Frothingham's late residence on Marlboro Street, Boston, and were conducted by Rev. Paul R. Frothingham and Rev. John W. Chadwick. Mr. Frothingham's selections were singularly appropriate and beautiful, concluding with a lovely hymn written by Mr. N. L. Frothingham, the father of Octavius. Mr. Chadwick's address was as follows:—

ADDRESS OF REV. JOHN CHADWICK.

Yesterday it was Thanksgiving Day, and it is Thanksgiving Day again to-day. Yesterday we were thankful for the gathered harvest: to-day we are thankful for a man gathered to his fathers, like a ripe ear into the garner; for “the harvest of a quiet eye,” which, brooding much on many things, enriched our lives with many noble thoughts, with many happy inspirations. It is no little matter for thanksgiving that the clear mind of whose integrity he was so jealous, and whose failure to respond to his demands upon it was the ill he dreaded most, kept to the last its unabated strength. Nor can we be too glad that, since the issue of the imperative command for him to lay down the work he loved so much, some sixteen years ago, he has never been without congenial tasks, thoughtful appreciations of the lives of other workers in the wide fields of humanitarian reform. And, almost to the last, he held the pen of which we can say, as truly as his beloved Thackeray said of his,—

“You never wrote a flattery
Nor signed the page that registered a lie.”

A certain brave sincerity was of the inmost heart, the very essence, of the man. Was it a character or a cause or a doctrine with which he was dealing, there he stood; and, so help him God, he could not otherwise than say exactly what he thought. His account of the matter might be more or less final; but it had the cardinal merit of sincerity, of sterling honesty, of exact conformity to his conviction of the truth. So shocking to him was the incongruity between men's private thoughts and public speech in the deep things of the spirit that he often minimized his own belief unduly through seeking to avoid an exaggerated tone, a possible expression in excess of his real thought. Then, too, he had his moods. He was a man of moods, always an optimist (he told a friend) on Saturday night, a pessimist on Monday morning. This meant that he was sensitive to physical conditions, to cerebral reactions, and that they determined his moods. And sometimes he spoke from these instead of from his deeper self, which was habitually hopeful and courageous. Perhaps it would not be too much to say that by temperament he was doubtful and misgiving, but serene and joyous on the heights of thought above the mists of temperamental zones.

So much sincerity and candor might have made him angular and hard if with it there had not been such lively sympathy,—sympathy at once intellectual and moral. He had what Renan—whom he greatly admired, and with whom he had much in common—called “the fatal disqualification of being able to see the other side.” Fatal to what? Fatal to dogmatism, certainly, and fatal to the inability to see the good in others and in their thoughts and ways. He preached a brace of sermons once upon the soul of truth in error and the soul of good in evil; but, in truth, all his sermons were illustrations of these principles. Sometimes his hearers objected that he stated the other side so handsomely that he made it more attractive than his own. He had a wonderful gift for entering into characters and ideas very different from his own character and ideas, and plucking out the heart of their mystery with a kindly hand. His orthodox friends frequently confessed that they never heard their position so well stated in their own churches.

He believed greatly in liberty, not as a need, but as an opportunity; and his was, above all things else, a liberating mind. There never was a less dogmatic spirit. He was always saying to his hearers, in effect, "Beware of me." Not for his friends to think his thoughts after him, but for them to think for themselves, to think freely, to think honestly, to think courageously,—these were the ends for which he worked, the goals of his desire.

So large his message was, so lofty and serene, that I have sometimes wondered that he could find in the great city of New York a thousand people willing and glad, from week to week, to come and sit under his spell. True, there was the noble style, the exquisite phrasing, an oratory that had been without a parallel in our pulpits since Edward Everett had abandoned them for collegiate and political activities. But there were no concessions to a promiscuous assemblage, to a lower taste: the thought and manner always kept the lofty heights. His hearers must go up to him: he could not go down to them, nor would they have him. Rather, they rejoiced, even if they could not always follow him upon his eagle flight, that,

"Native to the sky,
He could not hie

Downward, and give low hearts the wine
That should reward the high."

I remember that, when he was obliged to rest from his labors in New York, his friend Col. Higginson, who better than any other—William J. Potter being dead—could to-day declare his worth, spoke the most obvious and yet penetrating word of all our sad farewells when he said that Mr. Frothingham was "not one of these who are born radicals, who by their very nature are iconoclasts and in antagonism from early life with the position of those around them. He belongs," he said, "to a class that I might almost call higher, only that one does not wish to discriminate,—the class of those who, without being born radical, have radicalism by a tyrannous conscience thrust upon them, and spend their lives in doing, not the work that their whole natures long to do, but a work from which much in their temperament shrinks, and would gladly be excused."

What Mr. Frothingham would have liked best, I suppose, was a life spent in "beholding the bright countenance of truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies." It was not so to be. His immortal garlands were "to be run for, not without dust and heat"; and he went down to the arena, and ran for them as if the dust and heat were dearer to him than literature or art or brooding thought. He would not "accept private individual salvation." He would not "enter into final peace alone."

Conservative by instinct and by training, it was in the anti-slavery struggle that he first found himself obliged to break from his traditional moorings and tempt the open sea. He never went back to them. He went sailing on and on, finding new islands of belief and hope, new continents of truth and right. For many years his position was a very lonely one. It became less so at the last. The things which he had criticised and opposed in the ancestral house of faith passed into obscurity. The things that he had prophesied and longed for came out into the light; and he was very glad to have it so, and to find himself at home again with those from whom his heart had never been estranged.

Few, if any, of his immediate contemporaries did as much as he to ring out the old, ring in the new.

"We sit here in the promised land,
Enjoying freedom's honey and milk;
But 'twas he won it, sword in hand,
Making the nettle danger soft for us as silk."

There was no kinder heart. In the days before scientific charity—to which, perhaps, he never was converted perfectly—Dr. Belows said to me: "He will ruin me financially. He gives his purse to every beggar, and then sends him to me for mine." But he gave "more than the hand can hold." He gave encouragement to young men, sympathy with lonely struggles, new heart and hope to men and women hard pressed in life's unequal fray. And, though he had an inner circle of the warmest friends, his heart was often hungry for a wider sympathy and affection than he felt himself able to inspire. "My heart is warm enough," he once said to me, in a moment of pathetic confidence; "but I seem to have a wall of thin, transparent ice about me, so that people can't get at close quarters with me, nor I with them." But many a time the good, warm heart dissolved the icy wall, or some braver spirit broke it down; and who then so glad as he!

Though doubting and denying many things which other men believed, his sinking bark failed not to find the deeper sea; and to the last, I doubt not, he could say a large Amen to that superb denial of all fundamental doubts which one of our own poets flung one radiant morning, like a banner, to the breeze:—

"I do not doubt that the majesty and beauty of the world are latent in each iota of the world.

I do not doubt that there are realizations I have no idea of waiting for me through time and through the universe.

I do not doubt that the passionately wept deaths of young men are provided for, and that the deaths of little children are provided for.

I do not doubt that whatever can possibly happen anywhere, at any time, is provided for in the inherencies of things."

Ay, in the bosom of the Eternal God and Father of all, in whom we live and move and have our being, to whom be the glory forever!

REV. HELEN G. PUTNAM.

At the communion service held at the Church of the Disciples the first Sunday in December, Rev. Charles G. Ames paid a fitting tribute to the memory of Rev. Helen G. Putnam, the word of whose death had just reached him. Miss Putnam's noble work is said to have been inspired by the influences she received some years ago at the Church of the Disciples.

Such a soul would draw inspiration from some source as naturally as a child draws breath or a plant seeks sunlight. The Church of the Disciples rejoices in its share, with other heavenly influences, in feeding the springs of a noble woman's life.

"Alike are life and death,
When life in death survives."

THE CALHOUN SETTLEMENT.

Calhoun desires to report a few facts about its school farm and neighborhood work (leaving much unsaid). Two hundred and fifty students in on November 1. Some delay in the cotton field. School kept by the overseer. Eight academic and five industrial teachers on hand, in training and in earnest. Girls on the grounds, studying, and using the broom, the wash-tub, the ironing-board, the oven, dish-pan, needle, etc., for the cabin house that is to be. Boys on grounds have filled the barn to bursting with good things. They are digging for gold with hoes and shovels, and finding it. Class-room work in the eighth year "Elementary Course" never more satisfactory,—from kindergarten to new and first Senior Class.

Mr. Lemon's farm report will appear in the Southern Workman: $3,000 worth of stuff from sixty acres, not a dollar spent for commercial fertilizer. One-third of an acre of artichokes, cost $5, yields $500 in hog food. Compost heap, worth $750, 1,503 one-horse loads. Twenty-five acres of peas and melilotus for building up the land. Cost of farm per year, $1,186. New cow-house (built by friend in Somerville) and new poultry-house. Increase of hogs, from two to thirty-four. Experiment acre of cotton yields about one-half bale of lint, this cotton being put into pillows for students, and object-lessons in tufted mattress-making to be given to the mothers. $800 worth of eggs, milk, chicken, bacon, potatoes, syrup, etc., with promise of much more another year. Abundant garden yield in summer. Drought has killed the winter vegetables.

Farmers' conference vigorous. October meeting statistics showed more food-raising, less debt, and determination to buy land and escape from the new slavery of debtor-farming. Land company formed during summer, shares at $10. $60 deposited in bank November 1. Movement of population on to eighty acres for sale near school. Thrifty Negroes bound to have their children near the school.

This land selling at $50 an acre, worth $5 when school was started three years ago. Senior students making first payments, and determining to own land near the settlement. Last year very hard year in Alabama. Four and one-half cent cotton, yet $600 in tuitions paid by scholars. Work students are doing more and more for younger brothers and sisters. Financial year began June 1. Last year cost $20,000, about $7,000 going to new buildings and furnishing them. Living things will grow, but Calhoun has all the buildings it wants now. It will remain a settlement on a modest financial basis.

We have balance—a small one—on the right side, to begin December with. Calhoun issues urgent appeal for $6,000 to be paid in by January 1, that it may not be crippled, and may, during the balance of the school year, pay as it goes, and allow both principals to be at work in Calhoun. The writer is kept North by needs of securing money. He asks to be sent South soon. The expensive part of the school year is upon us. We trust the friends of the past, and expect new ones. A special effort is being made just now to get churches to give $50 scholarships. One church gave three of these last week. The National Alliance has heartily indorsed Calhoun, and urges the Branches in the various churches to give Montana School money to this settlement among the plantation Negroes of the Black Belt.

We are deeply in need of large and immediate help, and we believe it will come. Pray do not disappoint the boys and girls and fathers and mothers of Calhoun.

PITT DILLINGHAM.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

The only new book this week is an English book that is highly recommended, "The Life of Robert Rodolph Suffield," who left the Catholic Church and became a Unitarian in 1870. The book contains an account of his experiences, and also his conferences and correspondence with Dr. Martineau, who, it seems, was his counselor in the trials through which he passed in making the change. 327 pages. $1.25, net.

FINANCES.

The question of church contributions is at present the all-absorbing one at these rooms. It is, of course, too early to determine fully the results that we may reach; but enough has been learned from the collections thus far reported to show continued financial depression, or, what is more likely, to show that the real interest in our work has not yet become intense enough to affect the "pocket nerve." The "financial depression" is a very convenient excuse; but, even accepting it as an actual fact, it is not an adequate excuse. Suppose it does require a sacrifice to keep up the contributions: what has ever been gained that was worth having that did not cost a sacrifice of something? Contributions that represent only what can be conveniently spared represent nothing in the way of love for the work. "The gift without the giver is bare."

This is the time when we shall learn the real estimate in which the second great commandment is held by our churches and the people in them. The ministers are all mixed up with this emergency. The methods pursued, the word spoken from the pulpit and in personal conversation, the careful canvass of the congregation so that all may be given an opportunity to contribute,—these duties are all within his jurisdiction, and largely dependent upon his performance. There is no man or woman who bears the name of Unitarian, or who sympathizes with our work, that is not directly responsible for the manner in which this duty is met. Nor does the duty end with a contribution: it extends to the use of one's influence over others, that they, too, may be induced to do their duty. It is absurd to say that our churches have given all they can afford to give to our missionary work: almost any local charity can command more contributions than are given to the missionary work. The vast majority of our people will spend more money in pleasure or luxuries in one month than they give to this cause in two years. It is not poverty of purse, it is poverty of spirit, that prevents the coming of the kingdom; and it is time that the poor, hungry spirit took, at least, a "light lunch" of love, so that it might get strength enough to do at least a small part of its plain duty. The trouble is that we have so many men and women who have not even a "bowing acquaintance" with duty. It is to be hoped that the contributions that shall come in after this will bear evidence of greater respect for the principles which we are so fond of preaching, and which we take so much pride in pointing to as ours.

VISITS.

Sunday, December 1, Beverly, Mass., one of the old parishes, organized in 1667. An address upon "Our Denominational Work" to a good congregation. What a gain it would be to us all if these splendid old churches scattered through New England would take up this missionary work of ours with the zeal, the enthusiasm, with the spirit of self-sacrifice, which used to be put into "Foreign Missions," by our orthodox friends! Why is it that superstition and unbelief must be in a foreign land to entitle it to the continued, sustained attacks by those that are opposed to them? I hope this old church in Beverly will lead off in a crusade against Paganism at home, and begin by a good subscription to our missionary work, which has just this thing in hand. December 2, 10.30 A.M., Ministers' Monday Club. Dr. Herron of Iowa College gave a remarkable address, full of suggestion, intense, powerful. Dr. Herron occupies an advanced position in his view of the mission which Jesus came to accomplish. It is difficult to locate, or, rather, to classify Dr. Herron denominationally: he may not be willing to be classified as a Unitarian; but there is no reason why he should not be so classified, as he is emphatically on the side of the "Two Great Commandments." But, while it is true that he can be a Unitarian if he wants to be, it would be absolutely unreasonable to classify him as "orthodox." To hear him once is to make one want to hear him again. Whatever may be thought of his theories, no one can listen to him without the unqualified conviction that he is in "dead earnest" about what he says.

December 2, 1 P.M., Cambridge Ministers' Association. An interesting paper by Rev. W. H. Johnson, and a prolonged and edifying discussion. December 2, 7.30 P.M., "Starr King Club," East Boston. About fifty or sixty of East Boston's "solid men." A supper and a good time. If anybody says that men do not like to hear about religion, we can prove that it is not so by this very club.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

The Sunday School.

Mr. Dole's "Catechism of Liberal Faith" is meeting with a good sale. The paper-covered edition is well adapted for Post-office Mission work. Price in cloth, 35 cents a copy; $3.50 per dozen. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; $1.80 per dozen.

The usual Channing Hall "Talk" will be held at 25 Beacon Street on next Saturday, December 7, at 2.30 o'clock, conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. The subject treated will be Lesson XIII., "The Laborers in the Vineyard." All cordially invited.

The reprints of "Christmas Services" for sale by the Unitarian Sunday School Society are every way acceptable in exercises and music. No new service is issued this year, but the old ones seem to meet almost every want. They are the issues of 1888, 1892, and 1894. Price 5 cents a copy; $4 per hundred.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

MRS. LAURA ORMISTON CHANT will speak at the North End Union, 20 Parmenter Street, next Sunday, at 3.15 P.M. All are cordially invited.

REV. WALTER KNIGHT of Clifton Springs, New York, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

THE next meeting of the Norfolk and Middlesex (Mass.) Ministerial Association will be held with Rev. Philip Thacher of Needham on Wednesday, December 11, at 11 A.M. Rev. George W. Cooke will be present to confer with the members in regard to young people's societies and the new "Guild Services," after which the reading and criticism of sermons will be in order.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. James De Normandie will conduct the Wednesday noon service on December 11.

Ministers' Monday Club, December 9, 10.30 A.M.: Rev. W. H. Savary will preside. Rev. Leverett R. Daniels will give the address on the question, "Why do not People attend Church?"

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Rev. Minot J. Savage will speak on Sunday evening, at eight o'clock, upon "The Business Man."

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): The Sunday evening services are continuing with success. Next Sunday evening Mrs. Mary A. Livermore will speak on "A Look Ahead." Music by Mrs. Jennie Crocker Follett, soprano, and Mr. Leon Van Vliet, 'celloist. All seats free, and a welcome to all.

Arlington Street Church Branch: The ladies of the Arlington Street Branch of the Women's Alliance have arranged for Miss Charlotte W. Hawes to give her extremely interesting lecture on "The Music of the Bells," for their benefit. It is to be illustrated by the remarkable Shipp Brothers, with their wonderful bells, besides voices with bell accompaniment. This will be a unique entertainment, and one quite fitting to this Branch, there being a chime of bells on their church. It is hoped that the ladies of other Branches will take an interest, as they will be well repaid, and their support will encourage those interested in this good cause. The lecture and concert will be given at Copley Hall, Grundmann Studios, Clarendon Street, on Monday afternoon, December 9, at three o'clock. Tickets $1.50 each, to be had of the Oliver Ditson Company, 453 Washington Street, and at Kelley & Durkee's, 392 Boylston Street.

ATHOL, MASS.—A union service of the First and Second Unitarian Churches was held in the Second Unitarian Church last Sunday evening, when Mr. George W. Stone of Boston, treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, gave an address upon the organization and work of the Unitarian Church. Both of the local churches were represented in the presence of their pastors and of a full congregation. It was an inspiring service, splendidly assisted by the quartette of the Second Unitarian Church. A collection was taken, the suggestion of the pastors, as a free-will offering from the two churches to the Association. This is apart from the larger annual offering of each of these churches.—Chronicle, November 28.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. Minot Osgood Simons of Billerica will preach in the First Parish Church on Sunday next, December 8.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.—The ladies of All Souls' Church are preparing for a sale the middle of December, to help raise money for our much needed work. Contributions from friends everywhere will be gladly received, directed to Mrs. E. H. Price, President Women's Alliance, 404 Georgia Avenue, Chattanooga, Tenn.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COL.—The Unitarian church of this city has called Rev. W. A. Pratt of Keokuk, Ia., to its pastorate, at a salary of $1,800 a year. Those who know Mr. Pratt's admirable work at Keokuk will congratulate Colorado Springs if it secures his services.

DENVER, COL.—Unity Church has given a call to Rev. G. W. Cutter of Newport, R.I., to become its pastor at a salary of $3,500 a year. There is a strong hope that Mr. Cutter will accept, and that, under his leadership, the church will have renewed prosperity.

HYDE PARK, MASS.—The class of young men in the church of this place, under the leadership of the pastor, Rev. A. G. Pettingill, is showing much interest both by attendance and work. The church has been recently supplied with a new set of hymnals and psalms, and the Sunday-school with a new service and song book. The praise and thanksgiving service was helpful to all.

LOWELL, MASS.—The new Unitarian movement, fostered by Rev. George C. Wright outside of and unrelated to his other ministry in Lowell, is progressing well. "It started fifteen months ago in the request of some young men, mostly skilled mechanics, and having no church relations, that he give them some talks on Unitarianism. They hired a disused school building, which Hon. A. P. Bonney of this city rented to them at a low rental. This was fitted up simply and artistically, and named the Unity Congregational Church. There is in it a good gymnasium, of which Axel Pallander de Vega, a Swedish instructor, has the charge, also reading and dressing rooms, and a large lecture hall adorned with pictures and statuary. In the latter hall are held the church services on Sunday evening. There has been no advertising of the services beyond the usual Sunday notices. The congregations are not remarkably large, but are steadily increasing. The past year's expenses were fully met by the members, and this year additions are being made to the furnishings and to the gymnasium."

MADISON, WIS.—Madison is experiencing a genuine revival of interest. The morning congregations number upwards of two hundred, while the evening audiences tax the full capacity of the church. The "Contemporary Club" has outgrown the parlors, and is forced to meet in the main auditorium. For the first time in the history of the church its minister, Rev. W. D. Simonds, is invited to preach the Union Thanksgiving sermon in the Methodist Episcopal church. A Southern Wisconsin Ministers' Association has recently been organized, to which ministers of all denominations were invited. The Unitarian ministers of Madison and Janesville were cordially welcomed by their orthodox brothers, and Mr. Simonds was made one of the committee to draft the constitution. "Verily, the world does move."

MANKATO, MINN.—The Mankato Free Press of November 19 has a full account of Unitarian services held in that place by Rev. W. R. Lord of St. Paul and Rev. Carlton F. Brown of St. Cloud. Other meetings are announced to follow. Mankato is the most important town in the State in which there is no liberal church.

NEW YORK CITY, N.Y.—The work of the Friendly Aid Society of All Souls' Church has been practical and suggestive. Their programme of work shows how thoroughly the workers have studied the needs of the district which they have taken in charge, and how earnestly they are applying themselves to the difficult task of improving the conditions there. The new Friendly Aid House on 84th Street was formally opened on the evening of November 25. Ex-Mayor Hewitt, Rev. Lyman Abbott, John Harsen Rhoades, and others addressed the meeting; and a reception was held, while the house was open for inspection. A fine gymnasium with shower-baths, a lunch-room, to be made in the evenings a rival attraction to the saloons of the neighborhoods, a beautiful Assembly Hall, and a roof garden are among its many attractions. Rev. Frederick J. Gauld, the assistant minister of All Souls', is secretary of the Friendly Aid Society, and is in charge of its important and interesting work.

The liberal ministers of New York, Brooklyn, and vicinity, at their monthly meeting, December 2, unanimously adopted the following resolution:—

"Resolved, That the death of Rev. Octavius Brooks Frothingham takes from our fellowship one who was for many years a preacher and teacher of remarkable culture and intelligence, independence, and sincerity, a pulpit orator second to none among us in the force and beauty of his speech, a fearless advocate of the good causes of his day, a herald of the coming truths, of the new science and religion, and one who, by his manly protest against our defective liberality, did much to make it more consistent and complete,—as broad as his own intellectual and moral sympathies."

NORTHBORO, MASS.—The ancient and notable First Church in Northboro has found in Josiah C. Kent, who graduated from Meadville last June, the minister who is to continue its good work. Already he has begun his labors, but will not be installed for a few weeks yet. The union promises to be both profitable and lasting.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—A highly interesting event was the union Thanksgiving service at the First Church, in which joined that and the Spring Garden Unitarian societies with the New Jerusalem Church and the Rodef Shalom Synagogue. The rabbi of the latter, Rev. Henry Berkowitz, D.D., preached an eloquent sermon, full of a noble spirit of good will and religious liberality. He traced the progress of the principle of liberalism from early times in Europe, when all men were enemies, every castle a fort and robber's stronghold, through the period of developing commercialism, which his own people did so much to promote, and which carried not only the wares, but the ideas, of each country into every other, down to the present era, in which liberalism is becoming a recognized ideal, and gaining practical recognition in the relations of peoples and the constitutions of States.

He predicted, not the effacement of religious distinctions or associations, but the cordial union in spirit and in all good works of religious men, of every creed, of which the present service was an omen. A large audience, filling the ample church, in which representatives of the Old and of the New Jerusalem mingled with Unitarians and orthodox Christians, listened with close attention and many tokens of cordial sympathy to this remarkable discourse. Rev. William L. Worcester, pastor of the New Jerusalem Church, joined with Rev. Mr. Nichols and Rev. Mr. May in the devotional exercises. The impressiveness of the occasion was heightened by very beautiful special music. It was sincerely felt by many that this delightful service marked a new era in religion.

PORTLAND, ORE.—Rev. Stanley M. Hunter, formerly of the First Unitarian Society, Salt Lake City, has been delivering his lecture, "The New State of Utah," illustrated with many beautiful stereopticon views, at various points in Oregon. It is not improbable that he may be seen East with his lecture before long.

ST. PAUL, MINN.—Rev. W. R. Lord and the trustees of Unity Church have taken the initiative in raising money for the relief of Armenian sufferers, and the citizens of St. Paul are responding to their appeals.

TORONTO, ONT.—By invitation of the Public School Teachers' Association of the city, Rev. H. H. Woude, the minister of the First Unitarian Church, is delivering before the teachers a course of five Shaksperian lectures. This has led to his further engagement by the authorities of the Provincial School of Pedagogy to deliver three lectures—two on Shaksperian subjects, and one on Robert Browning—before the students, as a substitute of Prof. Goldwin Smith. The programme of Unity Club of the First Church shows a wide variety of subjects chosen.

WESTERLY, R.I.—The movement which was begun in this town three Sundays ago has in it much that is interesting and much that promises success. A number of lifelong Unitarians are taking hold, and those to whom our thought is new exhibit a quite pathetic eagerness to learn about it. The people gathered in groups around Rev. Mr. Lombard, Mr. A. M. Howe, and the superintendent, and plied them with questions or expressed their sympathy. Some of the leading people in the town were present, including merchants, the chairman of the town council, and manufacturers. The second service, on the 24th of November, was conducted by the superintendent; and last Sunday Rev. H. M. Mott of Providence preached on "Soundly Saved."

WINONA, MINN.—The Unitarian church has invited Mr. Joseph Cady Allen, late of the Meadville Theological School, to its pastorate. Mr. Allen's ordination is set for December 11. Winona is to be congratulated on securing a young man of such ability and earnestness as Mr. Allen to work for liberal Christianity.

General Religious Notes.

A prominent Protestant citizen of Petersburg, Va., has given $250 for the purpose of a memorial window to be placed in St. Joseph's Church now in course of erection in that city, "to the glory of God and in honor of his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons."

The bishop of Liverpool, while recently presiding over a diocesan conference, urged a needed reform of the Lower House of Convocation in both provinces, the reform of ecclesiastical courts, and a revival of order and godly discipline in matters of doctrine and discipline, a reform and reconstruction of the canons, and a larger recognition of the rights of laymen in the management of the affairs of the Church. The position of the laity was nothing more nor less than a rag and remnant of popery.

The first Russian Orthodox Church has recently been consecrated in the Mohammedan Transcaspian province, not far from Geoktopo. It is intended for the use of three of the new Russian colonies. Gen. Kuropolkin, after the ceremony, cautioned the Russian congregation to live at peace with their Mohammedan neighbors and fellow-subjects. "Although," he said, "they are not Christians, they are just as much human beings as yourselves. I hope that in all your dealings with them you will show by your peaceful temper that you are not Christians in name only."

The first congress of the Dutch Reformed Church has been recently held at Amsterdam. The number of societies and consistories represented gave the assembly especial importance, and its success surpassed all expectation. The great National Church discussed for the first time the question of the attitude which it ought to take toward social questions. The congress is divided into eight sections, which have studied the practical questions of the struggle against alcoholism, the line of political policy which it should follow regarding the different parties, reports of capital and labor, and similar subjects.

The New York Witness reports a remarkable ride made by a pioneer priest, Father John Begley, stationed at Kingman, Kan. A lady from New York was dying at the ranch of her son in the wilds of Texas, and Father Begley was sent for to give her the consolation of religion. "The distance was three hundred and ten miles. One hundred and sixty miles of this distance was over the wild prairies of Western Oklahoma, No Man's Land, and Northern Texas. Six relays of horses had been arranged for him by the ranchmen along the route from the end of the railroad at Englewood, Kan. He rode the entire one hundred and sixty miles in twenty-one hours and thirty minutes, and arrived at the ranch five hours before the sick woman became unconscious. He ate nothing during the ride, and took only one drink of water."

The returns which have been received from the Methodist conferences show that the delegates have voted for the admission of women to the General Conference. As far as heard from, the vote stands 4,365 for and 1,662 against it. The amendment has therefore received the constitutional number of votes to pass it.

"The order of King's Daughters," says the Troy Times, "organized nine years ago in New York City by ten women, now has a membership of more than four hundred thousand. One of its rules is 'to perform all services as silently as possible, not to talk about them unless it is necessary in order to stimulate others to do likewise, to forget the good done as quickly as possible, and move forward to the next opportunity.'"

Rev. William H. O'Connell of St. Joseph's Church, West End, Boston, will be the rector of the American College, Rome, in succession to his namesake, Mgr. D. J. O'Connell, who lately resigned the office.

On November 25 nine new cardinals were created at Rome. It is noticeable that six of these belong to other countries than Italy. Among them are Mgr. Satolli, the papal delegate to this country. Of the three Italians about to be elevated to the Sacred College, two, according to the Pilot, belong to the lowest orders.

Mgr. Francesco Satolli, who has just been created a cardinal, was born of a modest village family in July, 1839, at Marciano, in Umbria, and in the Diocese of Perugia. An elder brother of his entered on the ecclesiastical career; and he himself, who was gifted with ready talent and a good disposition, followed his brother. At the age of twelve years he was admitted into the Bishop's Seminary at Perugia. He was distinguished in literary and philosophical studies, and has held various positions of responsibility.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of the American Unitarian Association:—

Nov. 6. Bequest of the late Samuel E. Sawyer of Gloucester.....	$2,000.00
" 7. Society in Belmont, additional.....	65.00
" 11. Society in Concord, on account.....	500.00
" 11. Society in Mendon.....	14.25
" 12. New York League of Unitarian Women.....	10.00
" 16. Legacy of the late Mrs. Anne M. Sweetser of Boston as final payment.....	1,913.14
" 18. Society in South Natick.....	36.25
" 19. Mrs. Otis Norcross, Boston.....	100.00
" 22. Society in Lawrence, additional (in all $77).....	67.00
" 22. Society in Arlington.....	228.00
" 22. First Congregational Church, Athol.....	20.00
" 23. Society in Milford, N.H.....	17.07
" 25. Society in Ware.....	10.00
" 26. Society in Framingham, on account.....	131.00
" 26. Society in Trenton, N.Y.....	40.00
" 27. Society in Milton.....	502.00
" 27. Friends in Athol.....	10.71
" 29. Society in Waltham.....	298.00

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer,
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Business Notices.

For Irritation of the Throat caused by Cold or use of the voice "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are exceedingly beneficial.

A positive necessity for evening work of any kind is a strong, steady light; and there is none better than the Miller Lamp affords.

Only a Few Offered.—We doubt if there is a better suggestion for a Christmas gift at an expenditure of $10 than the special Christmas Writing Desk described elsewhere by the Paine Furniture Company. Our readers should not overlook one important fact in connection with these desks,—namely, that the number is limited; and immediate application is necessary to secure one at this special price.

Holiday Tours to Washington and Atlanta.—A special holiday tour via Royal Blue Line leaves Boston for Washington, D.C., Thursday, December 26. Trip occupies seven days, and rate covering hotel accommodations and every expense is but $23. On same date a party leaves Boston for the Atlanta Exposition, stopping at Philadelphia, Luray, Natural Bridge, Chattanooga, etc. Time occupied, ten days; rate $58. Both parties personally conducted. For itineraries, address A. J. Simmons, N. E. P. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

Journeys through Old Mexico.—Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's programme of travel through the Southern States, Mexico, and California cannot be equalled either in extent or variety, or in the completeness of the arrangements made for the comfort and well-being of their parties while en route. They have arranged for two parties the present winter, the dates of departure from Boston being January 23 and February 13. Elegant trains of palace vestibule sleeping and dining cars will be employed, thus providing every comfort and luxury for the journey. Both parties will visit New Orleans, the second one being there at the time of the Mardi Gras carnival. Full particulars of these comprehensive tours are given in a circular, which will be furnished free to any applicant by Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Deaths.

In Cambridge, 26th ult., Susan Elizabeth Chapman, eldest daughter of Lucy A. and the late Francis L. Chapman.

Chandler & Co.

We invite attention to the superlative quality of all the articles manufactured by

THE DR. JAEGER Sanitary Woollen System Co.

This system of Woollen Underwear and housekeeping goods is steadily growing in public favor and is indorsed by leading physicians of this country and Europe. We are Boston Agents for the sale of these goods, and will mail Catalogue upon application.

CHANDLER & CO. Winter Street, Boston.

FAITH REBORN.

"The old gods pass," the cry goes round,
 "Lo! how their temples strew the ground";
 Nor mark we where, on new-fledged wings,
 Faith, like the phoenix, soars and sings.

—Richard Le Gallienne.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

BY EX-GOVERNOR HOWARD OF RHODE ISLAND.

Although brought up and still remaining within the Congregational fold, I have long been a warm admirer of the works of Rev. Minot J. Savage. Recently I have happened upon a volume of his which had before escaped my attention, and which I have perused with such a degree of satisfaction that I am impelled to the effort to revive its contents in the minds of those who were once familiar with the work, and to attract to a contemplation of them, from the intelligent and thoughtful class, those who, like me, have been hitherto strangers to these particular papers of Mr. Savage.

Like most of the teaching of the distinguished author, the subject is treated argumentatively, and may be stated generally as a demonstration in concrete form of the existence of God, our certain possibility of access to him, and the duty and satisfaction resulting from a constant and practical recognition of this nearness. As it is not my purpose to enter upon a review of the entire subject, I content myself with a reference specially to the primary and most important contention,—God's existence proved. So far as I am aware, in this Mr. Savage has not only invaded a new field, but has made a pronouncement which may well arouse, not to say startle, the most profound thinkers on religious subjects. It is to be observed that the treatment makes no requisition upon revelation; neither does it summon to its aid any collateral support in the direction of abstract or metaphysical reasoning. It postulates certain admitted, well-understood facts,—solid facts, and from these, proceeding along a direct line, without aberration or assumption, arrives at the ultimate conclusion so clearly and distinctly that the candid reader is forced to concur. To illustrate, starting with the idea, or, rather, fact, that the child's first act of cognition is the knowledge that there are two things,—itself and something outside of itself,—its next step is the discovery that this not-self is the wonderful world, presenting itself in many wonderful aspects. It then realizes that this which is outside of itself is beyond its control, but that it is controlled by it. Its existence preceded that of the child, and will continue after its death. In some mysterious way out of it we must have come,—not only our bodies, but our minds as well. Out of it has come all that we call life,—foot and hand and brain; and, out of the brain, thought, feeling, love, fear, and hate,—not only an animal that hungers, but a Shakspeare who thinks, a Jesus who thrills the centuries. Whether we call this power a "he" or an "it," it is that which has made us, and not we ourselves. We must obey its laws: in its favor there is life, in its anger is death. Whether we call it God or world or universe or being, whatever it is, it is an ever-existing law unto us. How old is it? We cannot possibly conceive of its beginning or its ending. Therefore, it is, as to us, eternal. This much is proved: everything but ourselves is outside of us. It is not controlled by us, but controls us. Out of it we have come, and into it we must return. Obeying its laws, we live: in the infraction of them is death. And it is eternal.

To proceed a step further, as we cannot know its beginning or ending, so we do not know its limit. Take the wings of light, and travel to the farthest star, the light of which has been thousands of years in reaching the world, and, when you arrive, there are suns and stars and worlds an unmeasured distance beyond. This Being, then, is not only eternal, but infinite. Not only is it infinite, but it is omnipotent. In a drop of water there is a chemical power equal to that which is manifested by the flash of lightning that streams athwart the sky and the thunder that reverberates through the heavens. Consider the power of gravitation, how it holds the moon and all the little orbs of light in their places. All of this power resides in this Being which is outside of us, and so we stand face to face with an Omnipotent Being.

Again, this Being, which used to be worshipped in the ten thousand forms of polytheism, is now known to be essentially one, not many. "The grandest result of modern science is the demonstration of the unity of the universe." And the time seems to be approaching with swiftness when it will be settled that the whole material universe is of one substance. The doctrine of the conservation of force settles it that there is but one power in the universe, all the varieties being but different manifestations of this one. As Tennyson has it, "One law, one element."

The progress of an intelligent purpose is distinctly traceable from the beginning until now. Therefore, this Being has knowledge. It may not be like human intelligence, but it has a purpose which has run through all the ages.

Whatever this Being is, it has inspired the minds and souls of men. It has inspired sentiments of awe, of worship and reverence. If all is material, how can a pile of dead matter inspire one to bow down and worship that which contains nothing but that which is dull, inert, insensible? It is impossible to conceive of a sense of the sublime in connection with such a thing. Nobody can feel like going down on his knees to anything like this. The sentiment of aspiration is called out by a sense of the grand and magnificent.

Having shown that the Being that constitutes all outside of ourselves is self-existent, eternal, infinite, out of whose life we have come, a Being controlling us by its laws, a Being omnipotent, a Being that is one, a Being that can inspire awe, reverence, and aspiration, he asks, "Now, then, shall we call this Being God, or shall we call it Nature, or shall we call it Law or Power or Universe?" He then proceeds to show in terms of great power and eloquence, which can be only alluded to in a communication of this nature, that no other than a God of the high attributes with which our God is invested by us can possibly answer all these requirements. In this part of this remarkable paper the reasoning of the author is as close and direct and as irrefragable as in that to which I have referred more at length. And I am free to say that to me the argument is absolutely convincing and satisfying. It is because of this, and because I believe that it will be so to any intelligent, candid reader, that I have endeavored to enlist and re-enlist public attention.

Be it observed, there is nothing in the work which can be objected to by the most bigoted sectarian. There is nothing in the least degree polemical. It comes within the purview, not only of all Christian denominations, but of the entire human race. It touches the foundations of Buddhism and of Islamism, and every faith that is based on the concept of a divine Fatherhood. Although, as is the case with all of the productions of Mr. Savage, the subject is treated with a degree of simplicity and lucidity befitting a work intended to reach the common mind, it is my special desire to attract to the consideration of it that large class of thoughtful, cultured, and philosophic thinkers now concerned, as never before, in matters of religious and theological inquiry.

ECHOES OF THE CONFERENCE.

A correspondent in Kalamazoo, Mich., writes:—

"I write a line just to say that I could do excellent work with a number of the Christian Registers of October 31, those which contain a number of the sermons delivered at the Conference in Washington. I took one number to my Bible class last Sunday, and read Mr. Savage's sermon. I thought it was the best thing I could do; and a number spoke to me, saying: 'Oh, can I get that paper? I want to send that paper to such and such a one.'"

A UNIVERSALIST OPINION.

A correspondent, a Universalist, writes: "I see that Dr. Atwood of Canton has tried hard to say some smart things derogatory to Mr. Savage's sermon, preached at the late National Unitarian Conference. As one born into the Universalist church, and who has been in its ministry even longer than Dr. Atwood, I have very different opinion of Mr. Savage's sermon. To me it was a simple and yet a masterly statement of the most vital truths of religion and theology. If some of these things, or all of them, are old, they are also forever new. They never can be 'old straws.' The mode of threshing them may be such as to get no wheat from them. Mr. Savage seemed to succeed in getting an abundant harvest of noble and inspiring thought out of these truths. No more rational, hopeful, helpful, and inspiring sermon has been preached. Mr. Savage has given these truths a modern setting. He has put them into new relations. He has adjusted them to the present time, to the environment of modern progress and modern scientific methods of thought. It represents the broadest and best and bravest and most progressive type of Unitarianism, and of Universalism as well.

"I have not only read this sermon with great care, and with deep interest and admiration, but have also read every word of the twenty-five or thirty addresses made at the Conference; and, in our judgment, for number, variety, and importance of the themes, and for the able manner in which they were treated, no public religious body in America has, in the same way, done such a conspicuous, able, and illustrious service to the cause of truth and righteousness, and to the interests of freedom and progress in religion. It gives us pleasure to hold honestly such a judgment of the work of our Unitarian brethren.

"JAMES GORTON."

Literature.

"THE CHRIST OF TO-DAY."*

It is difficult to write a satisfactory review of Dr. Gordon's book within the limits that must here be observed. There are so many things to say that one hardly knows how to select the few things for which space is allowed. The whole book is wonderfully fresh and suggestive. It is written in a spirit of entire candor worthy the highest praise, and is plainly the fruit both of wide reading and of profound thought. One feels that in every part of it it is the work of a vigorous, clear-seeing, and manly mind.

With a great deal of it—perhaps with almost the whole of it—every reasonable Unitarian will find himself in entire agreement. To begin with, the book abounds in generous tributes to the worth of the work that has been done by the great leaders of the Unitarian movement. From no other author having a standing within "orthodox" ranks have come such words of sincere and intelligent appreciation of what these leaders have accomplished. Not once or twice only, but again and again, acknowledgment is made of the debt owed by all enlightened thought of the present time to men like Channing and Martineau and Hedge.

Traditional Orthodoxy is disposed of in even more vigorous terms than the Unitarian commonly employs. All partialistic schemes of salvation are utterly repudiated and abandoned. Even modified Calvinism is said to embody an "ultimate blasphemy of thought." God is for humanity, we are told, not for a mere remnant of the race. All men are, in their spiritual being, sons of God; and "salvation is righteousness." Progress toward the kingdom of heaven is an ethical movement; and whoever is outside this moral movement, "in this world and all other worlds, is outside salvation."

All this is so plainly the gospel which Unitarians are trying to preach, and is set forth with such fervor and depth of conviction, that points of disagreement might be easily forgotten or ignored. But one has some curiosity to see what root of difference or wall of division may be left, and it is as well perhaps to indulge that curiosity to a moderate extent. Dr. Gordon has spoken his mind about Unitarians with perfect frankness, both in criticism and in commendation. No doubt he expects an equal frankness in return.

* THE CHRIST OF TO-DAY. By George A. Gordon. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The difference between the two schools of thought first comes into view in what he has to say of the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of the spirit. He insists that these two kingdoms are, and must be, co-extensive and identical; but in Unitarian thought they are not necessarily the same. We are shown a line of thinking, through Fichte, Carlyle, and Emerson, which maintains that the kingdom of Christ is something other than the kingdom of the Spirit. Christ is in the latter "as superlative servant, but not as king." And then we are told that persons who think thus have "parted company with historic Christianity." If this be a charge of heresy, it is gently made; but what else can it mean?

The first answer is that here is no more a break with historic Christianity than Dr. Gordon himself has made. He dissents entirely from what he calls the "historic declaration that the Eternal is for a portion of mankind, and against the rest," basing his dissent upon what he believes to be the consciousness of Christ. The Unitarian does not believe that Christ claimed to be equal with God, or that historic Christianity lays upon him any obligation to hold the kingdom of Christ identical with a possibly larger kingdom of the Spirit.

If men had been thinking up till this present time that the sun was the centre of the whole visible universe, and that all the stars were made manifest by his reflected light, they might now discover that our solar system does not include the whole firmament, without sacrificing any of their relations to the great source of earthly light and heat. That discovery would not call upon them to part company with the astronomy of the past, but would carry this science on to larger and nobler results. The Unitarian does not see how it makes much difference to the work of practical gardening whether or not the sun is believed to send its life-giving beams through universal space. He has some interest, however, in the question whether the Christian world is to go on making the belief that its sun of righteousness is the centre of the spiritual universe a test for fitness to be employed in the vineyard of the Lord. He more than suspects that this belief is now somewhat out of date, and that the result will be decidedly unfavorable henceforth if it stands as a condition of membership to the Church.

Dr. Gordon earnestly counsels the Unitarian movement to return to the "essential and eternal truth hidden in the old creeds," and to seek a "profounder interpretation of historic Christianity." It is good advice, though, in point of fact, the leaders of the movement have not so much abandoned this "meditation" as he would seem to imply. But what is this essential truth? Since Dr. Hedge, Unitarian thought has generally taken the side of Athanasius against the Arians, though its interpretation of that controversy does not bring it into agreement with Orthodoxy. Dr. Hedge taught that the idea of a divine humanity was the great idea sheltered and protected for a time by the dogma of the Trinity. If this be the true view to take, then the doctrine of the Deity of Jesus is not much more than the husk of a great truth.

$15 DESK FOR $10.

We shall sell a hundred of these Special Christmas Desks in the next ten days at $10 each. This is all we have on hand; and the offer must then be withdrawn, as we cannot complete any more before Christmas.

In every way this is the greatest value we have ever offered in a Desk. The interior has the high overhang across the entire width, giving a clear writing surface 28 inches in depth and 28 inches in width,—almost as large as a Library Table.

The lid is carved on the outside in deep relief. It is hung on double automatic brass slides. There is a brass gallery on three sides of the top, so that this space may be used for books. With the wide lower shelf also used for books there is easily space for fifty volumes.

The construction is of solid oak, splendidly finished, with mountings and trimmings of burnished brass.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
 48 CANAL STREET.

Perhaps the weakest part of this book is that portion which argues for the possible supreme divinity of Christ by a chain of reasoning which, apparently, might equally well be employed to prove the possible supreme divinity of any other great character in history. But Dr. Gordon says that "Christ gives the possible stature of every man"; and is not this the "essential truth hidden in the old creed"? As to the value of the idea of a divine humanity, it would be hard to find a better statement than the one here made: "Faith exults in our time over the kinship which it beholds between God and man, and well it may. An essential community of being between divinity and humanity is the great postulate of a reasonable religion. All knowledge of God, all profound trust, and all intelligent worship must depend upon the assumption that men are the children of the Infinite."

This, then, is the foundation. The Unitarian of the present day is not specially concerned with the truth or falsehood of beliefs that may be erected upon this foundation, and it is very desirable that this point should be made clear. His denial is that secondary beliefs can rightly be made fundamental. He does not say that the Trinity is altogether false doctrine, but he does say that it is not essential to Christian fellowship. Christendom is united in saying that God is one: must it go on to say that there are three persons in this one? This is the issue which yet remains to be tried to a conclusion. No one can deny the right of a Christian to make that affirmation if it appears to him to be truth. Can Christian fellowship rightly be denied to one who does not so affirm? Unhappily, this book does not declare itself on that point.

For the rest, the greatness of the mind of Christ, the weight of his influence in every department of modern life, the mine of spiritual riches existing in the Gospels not yet coined and made current in the life of the world, the hope and faith and cheer which every sincere Christian derives from his Master's precept and example,—all this is so convincingly set forth that we cry, Amen and amen! The Christ of to-day stands before us, the divinest figure in human history, and our greatest witness to the validity of the dearest hopes of mankind. Dr. Gordon has written one of the most helpful books of our generation. Perhaps, as time goes on, there may be reason to say to him, "Sir, you have wrestled well, and overthrown more than your enemies."

H. N. B.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON, AND OTHER POEMS. By Richard Le Gallienne. Boston: Copeland & Day. Mr. Richard Le Gallienne's poem on Robert Louis Stevenson is not a cold, formal elegy. All through it there is the warmth of fervent admiration and personal affection. The only suggestion of chill in it is the questioning of immortality, and yet this is rather the more passionate appeal for revelation and light than the cold speculation of the agnostic. But of the immortality of Stevenson's fame he has no doubt.

"Strange craft of words, strange magic of the pen,
Whereby the dead still talk with living men;
Whereby a sentence, in its trivial scope,
May centre all we love and all we hope;
And in a couplet, like a rosebud furl'd,
Lie all the wistful wonder of the world.

"Not while a boy still whistles on the earth,
Not while a single human heart beats true,
Not while love lasts, and honor, and the brave,
Has earth a grave,
O well-beloved, for you."

There is fine workmanship in the chiselling of this tombstone,—no rude, cemetery carving, but work fit for a cameo. About thirty other poems are added, written in a variety of keys, most of them in the major, but with that minor chord here and there which is needed in even the most cheerful of music. There are songs of love, and friendship, poems of nature, bits of philosophy in small frames of verse, and some sweet and hopeful psalms in which the faith of religion is sung in the gamut of the modern poet.

THE MOTTOES AND COMMENTARIES OF FRIEDRICH FROEBEL'S MOTHER PLAY. Mother Communings and Mottoes rendered into English verse by Henrietta R. Eliot. Prose Commentaries translated and accompanied with an introduction treating of the philosophy of Froebel by Susan E. Blow. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.—The Register has often had occasion to express its sense of the value of the "International Education Series," with its systematic arrangement of the best educational writings, both old and new. Miss Blow is well known as a prominent kindergarten, equally familiar with the theory and the practice of Froebel's philosophy. Of her rendition of the prose Commentaries Prof. Harris says in the introduction: "This work is something more than a translation. The ideas of Froebel are transplanted into English, as if they had been thought and expressed here for the first time." Several of Mrs. Eliot's free translations of the mottoes have already appeared in the Register. She has skillfully interwoven with the substance of the original mottoes many of the ideas worked out in the Commentaries. This book is intended as the handbook for mothers or teachers, and a second volume will contain the songs and music which the children sing in their games.

THE MEN OF THE MOSS-HAGS. By S. B. Crockett. Macmillan & Co. $1.50.—Mr. Crockett has matched his "Raiders" in producing this stirring tale of the old Covenanting days, when the later Stuarts persecuted the signers, and when Richard Cameron preached, and when John Graham of Claverhouse rode up and down among the poor Highlanders, devastating the country and hunting down his victims. The story is told in the first person, as a transcript from the papers of William Gordon of Earlstoun. The book is especially remarkable for certain great chapters which it contains, chief among these being that story, one of the most pathetic in all literature, of Westerhall frightening the little children, the drowning of gentle Margaret Wilson, the preaching at the great conventicle at Dee Water, the last charge at Ayr-moss, and finally the adventure of Maisie Lennox, Gordon's faithful sweetheart, who dresses herself as a man, stops the king's messenger, captures his despatches, writes the names of her father and lover in two blank pardons, and, riding to Edinburgh, saves the prisoners before the messenger can arrive. The book takes immediately high rank as an historically faithful novel, dramatic and living.

THE LIFE OF NANCY. By Sarah Orne Jewett. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin & Co.—Miss Jewett shows no failure of invention in this last group of her stories. It is doubtful whether she has ever brought together the same number of more even excellence. We cannot help wondering at the fertility of her genius, and also to what extent she helps herself from observation and recollection, and to what extent she spins her thread from out her imagination. "Fame's Little Day" is one of the slightest of these stories, but it is a very jolly one. "The Only Rose" has a most interesting dénouement. How often do our grave debates come to such strange conclusions! but it is not often that the fates are so particularly kind in thwarting us. Miss Jewett is not given to tacking morals to her tales, or she would have found one here close to her hand, "Service of the living is the best remembrance of the dead." "All my Sad Captains" has very recently appeared in one of the magazines, where it was worth the subscription price for the whole year. We cannot be too grateful for a succession of stories so full of local color and of sweet humanity and delightful humor as are these.

DON. By the author of "Laddie," "Tip-Cat," "Pomona," etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—To say that a book is by the author of "Miss Toosey's Mission" has come to mean that it is wholesome, bright, and pure, moving sometimes with a pathos that contains no hint of weakness, and merry with the genuine joy not unfamiliar even in common lives of common people. This book, which begins a second dozen, is like "Pomona" in that it is the story of a girl left motherless in babyhood and intrusted to the care of one who brings her up with all a mother's devotion. The love story is charmingly, because naturally, told. Miss Whateley is as dear as bonny Sybil herself; and rough, faithful Don certainly deserves his happiness in fiction, whether the same result would be as satisfactory to all in real life or not. It is good to have our story-writers hold up ideals of happiness that are not dependent on conventional values, and this is an additional reason why this book is especially to be recommended to girls.

A KNIGHT OF THE WHITE CROSS. By G. A. Henty. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.—The boy of to-day who delights in tales of stirring adventure and heroic daring is rich indeed; for close to his hand are the books of Stanley Doyle, Conan Doyle, S. B. Crockett, and Robert Louis Stevenson, that unrivalled master of pure English. While Henty is not to be compared to these present masters of fiction, he must yet rank far above the many writers who concoct the stories of Indian warfare and hair-breadth escapes in order to gratify the taste for something sensational and melodramatic. There is nothing to be regretted in the fact that such stories as "The Knight of the White Cross" are popular with boys. It is a tale of the siege of Rhodes, when the Knights of Saint John were the great bulwark of Christendom against the invading Turks in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. It is a good story, and has many points that might be selected for especial mention.

THE CARVED LIONS. By Mrs. Molesworth. London: Macmillan & Co. $1.—Mrs. Molesworth is well known as one of the most popular English writers for children; and her refined, wholesome, and quietly interesting books deserve the large sales which they never fail to attain. She knows how to picture the every-day life of every-day children as something worth reading about, without seeking for unusual adventures or exciting escapes from danger. No ordinary child lives an uneventful life in his own estimation, for everything in life is important or interesting chiefly in its relation to other experiences. This is the story of a timid child, left for a time at a boarding-school among uncongenial associates and surroundings. The story is simplicity itself; but it will appeal readily to those for whom it is written, while yet it is not really sad, since we know all the time that the separation from home is but temporary.

JERRY'S FAMILY. By James Otis. Illustrated by George Foster Barnes. Boston: Estes & Lauriat.—The street waifs of New York have a firm friend in James Otis, who weaves stories of their enterprise and generosity with untiring facility. Jerry, the irrepressible newsboy of this story, makes a home for the unfortunate wife of a prison convict and her little baby, concealing from her his own privations. When

Samantha in Europe Josiah Allen's Wife's GREAT NEW BOOK

700 Pages of Fascinating Interest and Rollicking Fun. Over 100 Comical Drawings, by the famous Artist and Cartoonist, C. de Grimm. The adventures of this droll pair, Samantha and her faithful partner Josiah, in strange cities, royal palaces, and out-of-the-way places were most striking and skilful and also humorous in the extreme. Their trip was one round of excitement. The book that describes it is bound to make a sensation. The Jonesvillians and the rest of the world will split their sides laughing. It is an ideal book for Christmas, in its elegant bindings. Prices by mail or through agents, cloth (gold, silver, and black), $2.50; Half Russia, $4.00. Elegant Prospectus and outfit, $1.00. A big bonanza for Holiday trade. Everybody wants the book. Half a million copies will be sold. You can earn $200 to $300 before Christmas. Send for terms and territory.

FUNK & WAGNALLS CO., Publishers, 30 Lafayette Pl., New York.

Charles Scribner's Sons' New Books

LITTLE RIVERS. A Book of Essays in Profitable Idleness. By HENRY VAN DYKE. Profusely illustrated. 12mo, $2.00.

"Dr. Van Dyke has both the heart and the touch of an artist; he feels instinctively the charm of the world of woods and waters; he has a loving companionship with all sound human living, and he has the magic of style."—HAMILTON W. MABIE.

THE HUGUENOTS AND THE REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES. By Prof. HENRY M. BAIRD. 2 vols., 8vo, $7.50.

These two volumes conclude Prof. Baird's great historical series on the Huguenots, begun in his "Rise of the Huguenots in France" (2 vols., $5.00), and continued in "The Huguenots and Henry of Navarre" (2 vols., $5.00). The set of six volumes, in a box, price $15.00.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF NAPOLEON, his Family and his Court. Memoirs of Constant, first Valet de Chambre of the Emperor. Translated from the French. With an Introduction by IMBERT DE SAINT-AMAND. 4 vols., 12mo, $5.00.

THE ART OF LIVING. By ROBERT GRANT. With 135 illustrations by C. D. Gibson, B. W. Clinedinst, and W. H. Hyde. 12mo, $2.50.

"He deals with the practical problems in the every-day life of the every-day man with his own characteristic wit and fancy."—Boston Advertiser.

THE BACHELOR'S CHRISTMAS, and Other Stories. By ROBERT GRANT. With 21 full-page illustrations by C. D. Gibson, Irving R. Wiles, A. B. Wenzell, and C. Carleton. 12mo, $1.50.

"It contains some of the very brightest stories by this very bright author. A thoroughly fascinating and delightful book."—Philadelphia Press.

THE POOR IN GREAT CITIES. Their Problems and what is doing to solve them. By WALTER BESANT, OSCAR CRAIG, W. T. ELSING, WILLARD PARSONS, JOSEPH KIRKLAND, J. W. MARIO, J. A. RIIS, E. R. SPEARMAN, W. J. TUCKER, ROBERT A. WOODS. With an Appendix on Tenement-house Building by ERNEST FLAGG. Fully illustrated. 8vo, $3.00.

ECHOES FROM THE SABINE FARM. By EUGENE and ROSWELL MARTIN FIELD. Beautifully illustrated by Edmund H. Garrett. Square 12mo, $2.00.

UNC' EDINBURG. A Plantation Echo. By THOMAS NELSON PAGE. Illustrated by B. W. Clinedinst. Small folio, $1.50. Uniform with the handsome illustrated editions of "Marse Chan," "Meh Lady," and "Polly."

CONSTANTINOPLE. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Fully illustrated by Edwin Lord Weeks. Square 12mo, $1.50.

"It gives a charming description of Turkish life, and depicts sights and scenes in the Sultan's capital."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

WOMEN OF COLONIAL AND REVOLUTIONARY TIMES. A Series designed to portray the lives and the times of the eminent women of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods. The first volume, now ready, is on Margaret Winthrop, and written by Mrs. ALICE MORSE EARLE. 12mo, $1.25.

DOMESTICATED ANIMALS. Their Relation to Man and to his Advancement in Civilization. The Dog, Beasts of Burden, the Horse and Birds. By Prof. N. S. SHALER. Profusely illustrated. 8vo, $2.50.

THE AMAZING MARRIAGE. By GEORGE MEREDITH. 2 vols. 12mo, $2.50.

ENGLISH LANDS, LETTERS, AND KINGS. Queen Anne and the Georges. By DONALD G. MITCHELL. 12mo, $1.50. Continuing the former volumes, "From Celt to Tudor" and "From Elizabeth to Anne."

AMOS JUDD. A Novel. By J. A. MITCHELL, editor of Life. 16mo, 75 cents.

REFLECTIONS AND COMMENTS, 1865-1895. By E. L. GODKIN, Editor of the New York Evening Post. 8vo, $2.00.

COLLEGE GIRLS. By ABBE CARTER GOODLOE. Illustrated by C. D. Gibson. $1.25.

"The stories are all excellent in quality, and some of them are exceedingly bright."—Boston Advertiser.

MISS JERRY. By ALEXANDER BLACK. A novel and original love-story, illustrated from photographs from life. 16mo, $1.00.

COUSIN ANTHONY AND I. Some Views of Ours about Divers Matters and Various Aspects of Life. Uniform with "Windfalls of Observation." By EDWARD S. MARTIN. 12mo, $1.25.

CRUISING AMONG THE CARIBBEES. Summer Days in Winter Months. By CHARLES A. STODDARD, D.D., Editor of the New York Observer. Illustrated. 12mo, $1.50.

CAMEO EDITION. New volumes in this dainty series are: "A Chosen Few," selected short stories, by FRANK R. STOCKTON; "A Little Book of Profitable Tales," by EUGENE FIELD; "Reflections of a Married Man" and "The Opinions of a Philosopher," by ROBERT GRANT. Each volume, with etched frontispiece, 16mo, $1.25.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, 153-157 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

he is run over, and obliged to have his leg amputated, she is able to pay the debt of gratitude in kind. It would be impossible to write of life among New York newsboys without introducing plenty of slang and bad English; but it cannot be denied that Mr. Otis is generally considered a popular writer, and that he tries always to encourage manliness and sympathy among his small readers.

CUORE: AN ITALIAN SCHOOL-BOY'S JOURNAL. By Edmondo de Amicis. Translated by Isabel F. Hapgood. T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.50.—De Amicis is known best to Americans as a traveller whose charming books on different countries are a pleasant alternative to Baedeker. But in Italy his "Cuore" is more popular than any other of his writings. Miss Hapgood's translation was made ten years ago. We are told that upwards of one hundred and twenty-five editions have appeared in that time. This school-boy's journal is made up of a series of charming little stories calculated to inspire heroism, patriotism, manliness, industry, kindness, and courage. The new edition is illustrated with twenty-one full-page cuts, and ought to be popular among American school-boys.

LITTLE JOURNEYS TO THE HOMES OF GOOD MEN AND GREAT. By Elbert Hubbard. Published in New York and London by G. P. Putnam's Sons.—We have in this volume brief sketches of many of the eminent English writers, "the background being washed in with impression of the scenes and surroundings made sacred by the lives of certain good men and great." It contains much fresh matter, including personal incidents and facts. The book bears the stamp of the author's mind, and is full of virile thought. The incidents are told in a vivid style, and there is a vein of strong and vigorous thought running through the whole, which is both suggestive and stimulating. It is a book of unusual interest.

POETS' DOGS. Collected and arranged by Elizabeth Richardson. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—This collection of poems about dogs shows thorough search and careful selection. From the "Mahabharata," the Greek of Anaxeas, and the Latin of Virgil, down to the recent poetry of Richard Burton and Willis Boyd Allen, these short poems are taken, testifying to the love of these friends of mankind. Mrs. Browning's "Flush," Sir Walter's "Lufra," and Cowper's "Beau" hold equal place with dogs less celebrated or others who have lived only in the poet's fancy. It is a charming book for children, and humane societies will find it a useful ally.

WHERE HIGHWAYS CROSS. By J. S. Fletcher. With illustrations by Jayton Symington. New York and London: Macmillan & Co.—The author of "When Charles the First was King" has given us in this volume a story which abounds with vivid descriptions of events and persons. It is chiefly a love-story, and the chief characters are well drawn. It portrays the growth of affection in Hepworth, and the constancy of woman's love in Elizabeth, and has touches both of pathos and tragedy. The sentiment of the book is wholesome.

WASHINGTON IN LINCOLN'S TIME. By Noah Brooks. The Century Company.—Mr. Brooks was a newspaper correspondent in Washington during the Civil War, and a personal friend of President Lincoln at that time. In this volume he has given us personal recollections of Lincoln and his household members of his cabinet, and describes graphically the course of events, and introduces pen-portraits and historical incidents of interest and value. It is a good contribution to our war history.

LYRE AND LANCET: A STORY IN SCENES. By F. Anstey. New York: Macmillan & Co. ($1.25).—In amusingly ambiguous conversation and clever situations Mr. Anstey always succeeds, particularly in this little book. The horse doctor and the poet become hopelessly mixed up, to the embarrassment of the other characters and the delight of the reader. The fun lasts a little too long, perhaps; and there are over many characters. The apt illustrations are a strong point of the book.

THE HELEN JACKSON YEAR BOOK. Selected by Harriet T. Perry. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—From the rich mine of Helen Jackson's writings are gathered a few gems of thought, both in poetry and prose, suited for each day, and put in the form of a Year Book. The selections are both suggestive and helpful, and are well fitted to uplift and stimulate thought and lighten the burdens of daily life.

THE RABBIT WITCH, AND OTHER TALES. By Katharine Pyle. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 31 West Twenty-third Street. The children will welcome this dainty volume, with its series of tales told in verse, and fitly illustrated. The table of contents gives a varied list of stories told in verse, with illustrations, both of which are full of mirth and fun.

Recent Poetry.

Frederick A. Stokes & Co., New York, publish a charming little book called "Rhymes and Roses," by Samuel Minturn Peck, one of the younger Southern poets. He has the lyrical gift to a remarkable degree, much ingenuity in the way of metrical arrangements, a happy art for turning things, a fancy pure and sweet. So qualified, he has of course given us multum in parvo, a great deal of pleasure in a little book. We find ourselves liking his simplest measures best, and his lyrics of nature and vers de société better than his love-songs. Not without good self-knowledge did he set "The Winter Rain" in the forefront of his battle with the critics.

"In the Young World," by Edith M. Thomas (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), is a book of genuine poetry. Coming from Miss Thomas, it could be no less. It must, however, we imagine, look for its audience rather to grown people of the finest taste than to children or young people, if for these it was primarily intended. We fear the child must be precocious or the young person uncommonly mature in thought and feeling who can appreciate the majority of the pieces. There are some

Riley Brothers,

(Bradford, England.)

16 Beekman St., New York, are the largest manufacturers of Stereopticons, Magic Lanterns and Views in the world. Agencies in Chicago, Boston, Chattanooga, Tenn.; Kansas City, Mo.; Minneapolis, Minn.; San Francisco, Cal., and Portland, Ore. Everything in the Lantern business furnished. Instalment plan of purchase, and slides rented. We can do all your business and save you money.

Send for free literature. Illustrated catalogue 20c.

RILEY BROTHERS,

Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York. BOSTON: 84 Washington St. CHICAGO: 126 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND: 411 Couch St.

A Delightful Traveller.

In a most charming review of Rev. FRANCIS TIFFANY's fascinating book of travel,

This Goodly Frame, the Earth,

Rev. S. M. CROTHERS in the Christian Register says, among scores of other just and felicitous remarks: "While the body is traversing space, the mind is making still longer excursions into past time, and visiting the scenes we dream of. Here is the kind of a traveller who will have time to call at Colchis and make kindly inquiries about the golden fleece.

"What a pleasure awaits the reader, on some winter evening, when he comes to the chapters on Agra and Delhi! He is not merely taken to the British India of the present, but he catches an entrancing glimpse of the India of the Moguls,—vast, mysterious, luxurious. He is transported to the times when

'In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree.'

There is exquisite art in the contrast between the light touch of the chapters on Japan and the sombre reflections which come in the presence of the deserts and the temples of Egypt. But the reflections are never too long drawn out, and the reader is not asked to take them too seriously."

A SHEAF OF NOTES of travel gathered hastily; but the traveller's eyes were sharp and his senses keen, for he has not failed to catch the significant things and to transfer them to a mental camera plate, which has produced a fine positive, full of life and sentiment, with local color. Not many men can journey round the world and bring back so many clear and vivid impressions of the surface of life in many lands and among so many sorts of people as are found in this volume. It is not the journal of the traveller that fills these pages. It is rather the impressions of an artist, and they are given with a freshness and vivacity that increase the charm mightily.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A handsome volume. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

Sold by all Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Books for the Youngsters.

JOEL: A BOY OF GALILEE. By ANNIE FELLOWS JOHNSTON. With 10 illustrations by Searles. Square 12mo, cloth, $1.50. "Reverent, tender, and pathetic."—N. Y. Herald.

THE KEEPER OF THE SALAMANDER'S ORDER. A Tale of Strange Adventures in Unknown Climes. By WILLIAM SHATTUCK. With 95 illustrations by Walter and Isabel Shattuck. Small 4to, cloth, $2.00. "Abounds in daring and amusing conceits."—Buffalo Commercial.

THE MUSHROOM CAVE. By EVELYN RAYMOND, author of "The Little Lady of the Horse." Illustrated by Searles. Square 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

"Full of youthful fun and frolic."—Detroit Tribune. "An exceedingly interesting book."—Cambridge Tribune.

A JOLLY GOOD SUMMER. By MARY P. WELLS SMITH, author of "Jolly Good Times," etc. Illustrated by Jessie McDermott. Square 16mo, cloth, $1.25.

IN THE OKEFENOKEE. A Story of War Time and the Great Georgia Swamp. By LOUIS PENDLETON, author of "The Wedding Garment," etc. Illustrated by Searles. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"Will be read with intense interest by boys of all ages, even to the gray-headed."—Boston Home Journal. "A fascinating tale."—Woman's Journal.

THE LITTLE LADY OF THE HORSE.

By EVELYN RAYMOND. With 21 illustrations by Merrill. Small 4to, cloth, $1.50.

THE KNIGHTING OF THE TWINS. And Other Stories. By CLYDE FITCH. Illustrated. 4to, $1.25.

ANOTHER GIRL'S EXPERIENCE. A Story for Girls. By LEIGH WEBSTER. Illustrated by Jessie McDermott. 16mo, cloth, $1.25.

THE LAST OF THE PETERKINS AND OTHERS OF THEIR KIN. By LUCRETIA P. HALE. Illustrated. 16mo, cloth, $1.25.

At all booksellers. Mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, Publishers, BOSTON.

This is a perfectly delicious transcript of child life, with no pretentiousness of any kind about it, but just simple and true. We can almost fancy a child's voice echoing through the pages.

So says the Pacific Churchman of Little Miss Phoebe Gay

By Miss HELEN DAWES BROWN, adding:

"She had a sight of Emerson and the honor of a visit to Miss Alcott, the creator of so much pleasure for children. There are delightful grandparents, a charming old house, and other pleasant things. Any healthy-minded child will revel in it, and we recommend it to the kindly people who are beginning to think of Christmas-tide and the small folks who have claims upon them."

The charming book has a colored design on the cover and other pictures. Price, $1.00.

Sold by all Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

The Best Christmas Gift or the best addition to one's own library is WEBSTER'S INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

Successor of the "Unabridged."

Standard of the U. S. Gov't Printing Office, the U. S. Supreme Court, and of nearly all the School-books.

Warmly recommended by State Superintendents of Schools, and other Educators almost without number.

THE BEST FOR EVERYBODY BECAUSE

It is easy to find the word wanted.

It is easy to ascertain the pronunciation.

It is easy to trace the growth of a word.

It is easy to learn what a word means.

G. & C. MERRIAM CO., Publishers, Springfield, Mass., U. S. A.

Specimen pages, etc., sent on application.

DOROTHY AND ANTON. A sequel to "Dear Daughter Dorothy." By A. G. PLYMPTON. Illustrated by the author. Square 12mo, cloth, $1.00. "Noteworthy alike for beauty of sentiment and wording."—Beacon. "As loving and sweet as ever."—Boston Herald.

FRWZLE, THE RUNAWAY. A Fable for Children. By LILY F. WESSELHOEFT, author of "Sparrow, the Tramp," "Flipwing, the Spy," etc. Illustrated by Jessie McDermott. Square 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"Something after a child's own heart."—Observer. "Healthy, simple, natural books."—Boston Journal.

THROUGH FOREST AND PLAIN. A Tale of Flowers and Filibusters. By ASHMORE RUSSAN and FREDERICK BOYLE. Illustrated by Barnes. 16mo, cloth, $1.50. "Crowded with thrilling episodes well told."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

By M. CARRIE HYDE.

GOOSTIE, YAN AND NOCHIE OF TAPPAN SEA. UNDER THE STABLE FLOOR. 3 vols. Illustrated. Square 16mo, cloth back, paper side. Each, 50 cents. "Simple, the moral is healthy and the style fitted to the apprehensions of young people."—N. Y. Herald. "Three most fascinating stories."—Advertiser.

MY HONEY. A Story. By the author of "Miss Toosey's Mission." 16mo, cloth, $1.00.

THE LITTLE LADY OF THE HORSE.

JOCK O'DREAMS. A Child's Story Book. By JULIE M. LIPPMANN. Illustrated. 12mo. $1.25.

A LOST HERO. By ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS WARD and HERBERT D. WARD. Illustrated by F. T. Merrill. Small 4to, cloth, $1.50.

TEN TIMES ONE. The Possible Reformation. By E. E. HALE. 16mo, cloth, $1.00; paper covers, 25 cents.

Gift Books.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."

Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages. "One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages. "There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages. "Rev. Marion D. Shutter is well known as an essayist and thinker of exceptional ability. This little volume ought to be in the hands of every parent and teacher, as Dr. Shutter has grasped in a notable way the soul of the new educational methods, and in these five chapters he employs them in a most striking manner."—The Arena.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

 For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by
JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

Mrs. Sarah K. Bolton's New Book.
"Famous Leaders among Women."
Just published. Makes Biography as interesting as fiction. Mrs. Bolton writes with a high moral purpose, and her books are uniformly successful. They are being adopted in many schools for supplementary readers.
Fully illustrated with portraits, $1.50.
For sale by all booksellers.
T. Y. CROWELL & CO., New York and Boston.

that are not amenable to these strictures, if such they are. And it is not strange that Miss Thomas, whose poetry has always been for a select company, when writing a book of this kind, should make it a book for select children. More children of a larger growth, however, full-statured men and women, will be likely to enjoy it than the habitual course of her verse.

Miscellaneous.

Lee & Shepard publish the second of the "Hazelwood Series," written by Grace Le Baron. "Little Daughter" contains the story begun in "Little Miss Faith," published a year or so ago; but its interest is independent of the earlier book. It is intended to give moral teaching and general instruction to its young readers as well as to supply them with harmless reading; but much of it, especially the main incident of the book, is unnatural and sentimental.

Those who are seeking for Christmas booklets should not overlook "All of Nature's Fashion in Lady's Slippers," by C. S. Young, just published by Bradlee Whidden, 18 Arch Street, Boston. Those who have hunted the slipper, not in the household game, but in the woods of New York and Northern New England, will be delighted to see some of their old friends reproduced in the beautiful photogravures from the living plant. A charming little booklet for the flower-lover. 75 cents.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons publish Irving's "Tales of a Traveller" in two large octavo volumes, in what they call the "Buckthorne Edition." They are elaborate in their magnificence. Every page has an ornamental border. There are many beautiful, full-page illustrations, photogravures; while the initial letter of each chapter is associated with a little woodcut engraving of suggestive character and artistic beauty. In paper and typography the same high standard is attained, and the binding is in keeping with the things enclosed. Of the "Tales" themselves it is unnecessary to speak at this late day. With "The Sketch-book" and "Bracebridge Hall" they give us Irving at his best; and that is very good,—something that time has not withered yet, nor custom staled. Here is the ideal "gift-book,"—one the spiritual substance of which would commend it to us, though it came dressed in the meanest fashion.

Literary Notes.

"Meadow Grass," the delightful book written by Miss Alice Brown, and published by Copeland & Day, has just reached its third edition.

Mr. W. D. Howells has written a striking paper for the December Forum on "The Nature of Liberty," contending that liberty and poverty are incompatible.

Roberts Brothers make the important announcement of an illustrated edition of Balzac's works as translated by Miss Wormeley. The edition will be in forty octavo volumes, limited to one thousand numbered sets. The work will be sold by subscription.

The announcement of a reduction in the price of Littell's Living Age from $8 to $6 will be of interest to lovers of good literature. This standard weekly is the oldest, as it is the best concentration of choice periodical literature. It brings together the current productions of brilliant writers and profound thinkers; and, for the amount and quality of the reading furnished, the new price makes the Living Age the cheapest as well as the best literary weekly in existence.

Mr. Leslie J. Perry has gathered together a number of interesting letters and indorsements of President Lincoln relating to prisoners of war; and they will appear in the Christmas Century, under the title "Appeals to Lincoln's Clemency." It is said to have been almost impossible in the early days of the war to secure Mr. Lincoln's consent to the execution of a soldier for desertion; but later he was obliged to give less attention to personal appeals. A characteristic indorsement is one found on a large bundle of papers covering a single case, and that unimportant: "What possible injury can this lad work upon the cause of this great Union? I say let him go. A. Lincoln."

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Estes & Lauriat, Boston.
The Boys of 1745 at the Capture of Louisbourg. By James Otis. Illustrated. Price 75 cents.
Zigzag Journeys around the World. By Hezekiah Butterworth. Fully illustrated. Price $2.00.
Five Minute Stories. By Laura E. Richards. Illustrated by A. R. Whelan, E. B. Barry, and others. Price $1.25.
Hildegard's Neighbors. By Laura E. Richards. Illustrated. $1.25.
Melody. By Laura E. Richards.

Chatterbox for 1895. Edited by J. Erskine Clarke, M.A. Price $1.25.
Round the Yule-log. Christmas in Norway. By P. Chr. Asbjörnsen. Translated by H. L. Broekstad. Price 50 cents.

From Lee & Shepard, Boston.
Whiffs from Wild Meadows. By Sam Walter Foss. Illustrated. $1.50.
A Lieutenant at Eighteen. By Oliver Optic. Price $1.50.
On Winds of Fancy Blown. Original verse and illustrations. By Mary Yale Shapleigh. Price $2.00.
Poems of the Farm. Selected and illustrated by Alfred C. Eastman. $2.50.

From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.
The Republic of Childhood. Froebel's Gifts. By Kate Douglas Wiggin and Nora Archibald Smith. Price $1.00.
The Complete Poetical Works of Oliver Wendell Holmes. Cambridge edition. Price $2.00.

From Bradlee Whidden, Boston.
All of Nature's Fashions in Lady's Slippers for the Northern Parts of the United States. By C. S. Young. With photogravures from the living plant. Price 75 cents.

From Ginn & Co., Boston.
Outline of the Philosophy of English Literature. Part I. The Middle Ages. By Greenough White, A.M., B.D.
From the Werner Company.
The Werner Primer for Beginners in Reading. By F. Lillian Taylor.

From Charles W. Sever, Cambridge, Mass.
Words for Music. By William Wells Newell. Price $1.00.

From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.
Novels by Eminent Hands. By William Makepeace Thackeray.
The Echo Club. By Bayard Taylor, with a prologue by Richard Henry Stoddard.
The Secret of Mankind.
Israel among the Nations. A study of the Jews and Anti-Semitism. By Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu. Translated by Frances Hellman.
The Midsummer of Italian Art. By Frank Preston Stearns.

From Harper & Brothers, New York.
Harper's Round Table, 1895.
A House-boat on the Styx. By Kendrick Bangs. Illustrated.
Aftermath. Part Second of "A Kentucky Cardinal." By James Lane Allen.

From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.
Window and Parlor Gardening. By N. Jönsson-Rose. With illustrations by the author. Price $1.25.
Joseph, the Dreamer. By Robert Bird.

From Thomas Whittaker, New York.
The Great Charter of Christ. Being studies in the Sermon on the Mount. By the Rt. Rev. W. Boyd Carpenter, D.D., D. C. L. Price $1.50.

From Cassell Publishing Company, New York.
Girls New and Old. By L. T. Meade. With eight illustrations by J. Williamson.

From Macmillan & Co., New York.
Our Mutual Friend. By Charles Dickens. With forty illustrations by Marcus Stone.

From A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.
Our Industrial Utopia and its Unhappy Citizens. By David H. Wheeler. Price $1.25.

From Thomas G. Newman, Chicago, Ill.
Automatic or Spirit Writing, with Other Psychic Experiences. By Sara A. Underwood.

Notable Gift-Books.

Mrs. Jameson's Works on Art.

SACRED AND LEGENDARY ART. 2 vols.
LEGENDS OF THE MONASTIC ORDERS.
LEGENDS OF THE MADONNA.
MEMOIRS OF THE EARLY ITALIAN PAINTERS.

Edited by Miss ESTELLE M. HURLL, with a memoir and portrait of Mrs. Jameson. This forms a very beautiful and desirable edition of Mrs. Jameson's Art Works. 5 vols., crown 8vo, bound in simple but artistic style. Each volume contains nearly 100 illustrations, selected from the works of great masters. $3.00 each; the set, $15.00; half calf, gilt top, $25.00.

Standish of Standish.

By JANE G. AUSTIN, author of a "Nameless Nobleman," "Betty Alden," etc. With twenty full-page illustrations by FRANK T. MERRILL. Carefully printed, attractively bound. 2 vols., 12mo, gilt top, $5.00.

Mrs. Austin's most popular novel of the Pilgrims of the Old Plymouth Colony has been illustrated with fine intelligence and exquisite skill by Mr. Merrill, and the two handsome volumes are every way beautiful and attractive.

A Victorian Anthology.

Selections illustrating the Editor's critical review of British poetry in the reign of Victoria ("Victorian Poets"). Selected and edited by EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN. With brief biographies of the authors quoted, a fine frontispiece portrait of Queen Victoria, and a vignette of the Poet's Corner in Westminster Abbey. Large crown 8vo, bound in attractive library style, $2.50; full gilt, $3.00; half calf, $4.50; full levant, $6.00.

Mr. Stedman has availed himself of the vast range and richness of the field of poetry in Great Britain during the last sixty years to prepare a book of rare value and attractiveness.

Cambridge Poets.

Complete Poetical Works of

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES,
H. W. LONGFELLOW,
JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Beautiful volumes, each with a portrait, a vignette, biographical sketch, notes, chronological tables, indexes of titles and first lines. Each large crown 8vo, $2.00; half calf, gilt top, $3.50; full levant, $5.50.

Cambridge Browning.

Containing over 1,000 pages, printed on thin but opaque paper. Large crown 8vo, $3.00; half calf, gilt top, $5.00; tree calf or full levant, $7.00.

Sold by booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS

men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times
DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT IN NEW YORK
With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs.
Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott.

A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. 84th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed it." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. We pay Freight to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Outfit. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

Very Brightly Written

The Coming of Theodora

By Eliza Orne White

1 Vol., 16mo. $1.25.

"A very effective story. It portrays with remorseless yet not unsympathetic fidelity that type of character which has all the virtues, but also is determined that others shall be both virtuous and happy in precisely its own fashion; and it cannot allow divergence from its own opinions. Such good but uncomfortable people are numerous, but they seldom are described so entertainingly as in this delightfully and skilfully written book."—The Congregationalist.

"Miss White's outlook upon life seems full of brightness and cheer, her study of the crankiest human nature is illumined by a keen sense of humor, and the moral she points is as salutary as the tale she adorns is clever and entertaining."—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

"A most entertaining story, that will charm refined and appreciative readers."—Boston Beacon.

"The story is very brightly written and thoroughly wholesome."—Pacific Churchman.

"Miss White has never written anything as good as this story of an intol-erably good woman."—Boston Gazette.

"Miss White's picture of Theodora is as refreshing as a sea breeze."—The Academy, London.

Miss White's Other Books

Winterborough. 16mo, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"A most exceptional book. It is a New England tale, but its originality is its strong feature. . . . The humor and the kindly but keen philosophy of 'Winterborough' are admirable."—Phila. Telegraph.

When Molly was Six. With a colored cover design and other illustrations by KATHARINE PYLE. Square 16mo, $1.00.

"A delightful little book, a story of little-girl life, whose author seems to have as genuine a gift for writing for children as for grown folks."—Boston Transcript.

Sold by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,
BOSTON.

BOYS & GIRLS XMAS BOOKS.
STORIES OF AMERICAN HISTORY.

By James Otis, author of "JENNY WREN'S BOARDING HOUSE," etc. Each story complete in one volume, with 16 illustrations.

1. Boys of 1745. The capture of Louisbourg.
2. An Island Refuge: Casco Bay in 1676.
3. Neal the Miller: A Son of Liberty.
4. Ezra Jordan's Escape from the Massacre at Fort Loyal.

Stories of our Colonial and Revolutionary history in the garb of fiction, the characters being mostly from history. No American boy should fail to read them all. 12mo, cloth. Each 75c.

DOTY DONTCARE. A story of the garden of the Antilles, by Mary Farrington Foster. Introduction by Dr. Elliott Coues. 16mo, cloth. $1.00

FIVE MINUTE STORIES. By Laura E. Richards, author of "Captain January," "Melody," etc. A charming collection of short stories and clever poems for children. 12mo, cloth, illustrated. $1.25

CHATTERBOX, 1895. King of all children's annuals. Over 200 illustrations and 400 pages of choice reading matter. 4to, boards. $1.25

WHEN LOVE IS DONE. A strong entertaining novel. By Ethel Davis. 16mo, cloth. $1.25

SCHOOL BOYS IN JAPAN. By Andre Laurie. Illustrated. A picture of some aspects of social customs, manners, etc., which are seldom touched upon by more serious writers. Other volumes in the series are "School-boys in Italy" and "School-boys in Russia." Small 8vo, cloth, with very handsome cover design. $1.50

For sale by booksellers generally, or sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

ESTES & LAURIAT, Boston.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Price REDUCED from $8.00 to $6.00

CONTRIBUTE TO MAKE THIS PERIODICAL
Encyclopedic in Scope, Character, Completeness, Comprehensiveness.

INDISPENSABLE
to every reader of intelligence and literary taste.

The thoughtful reader will find in
THE LIVING AGE

Food to NOURISH, STIMULATE AND INSPIRE THOUGHT
A Weekly Magazine, it gives more than Three and a Quarter Thousand double column octavo pages of reading - matter yearly, forming four large volumes.

It has received the commendations of the highest literary authorities, the most distinguished statesmen, the brightest men and women of the country, and has proven a source of instruction and entertainment to many thousands. It commends itself especially to busy people of moderate means for they will find in it what they cannot otherwise obtain, except by a large expenditure of time and money, yet which is so essential to every one who desires to be well informed concerning all the great questions of the day.

"One may find here all that it is worth his while to know of foreign literature in all its departments."—Advance, Chicago.

"A vast amount of good reading at a merely nominal price."—Boston Advertiser.

"No gentleman's library should be without this eclectic."—The Nation, New York.

Subscription REDUCED from $8.00 to $6.00.

This makes The Living Age absolutely the cheapest magazine published. - -

Subscribe Now for 1896 and Receive Free the intervening weekly issues of 1895.

Single copies 15c. each.
For sale by all booksellers and newsdealers.

Rates for clubbing THE LIVING AGE with other periodicals will be sent on application. Address,

LITTELL & CO., P.O. Box 5206, Boston.

Just Published

A CATECHISM
OF LIBERAL FAITH

By Rev. Charles F. Dole

The following extracts from the Preface show the character of this new manual: "The purpose of this Catechism is to further a thoughtful understanding of the good life. The wish here is to show that man belongs to an unseen universe; that this universe is divine and beneficent; that a certain distinct and noble type of thought, feeling, and conduct is in accord with such a universe; and that the highest and largest life grows out of the realization of these facts."

The book contains 34 chapters. Pages 112. In cloth, 35 cents a copy; per dozen, $3.50. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; per dozen, $1.80.

Revised Edition

UNITARIAN CATECHISM

By Rev. Minot J. Savage

We also have for sale Mr. Savage's Catechism (published by George H. Ellis), which has been used in our Sunday-schools for some time with great favor. The author says in his Preface: "This little Catechism has grown out of the needs of my own work. It is an attempt to help teachers and parents by putting in their hands in brief compass the principal things believed by Unitarians concerning the greatest subjects. This is an effort to make the path of ascertained truth a little plainer."

Pages 67. In cloth, 30 cents a copy; per dozen, $2.50. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; per dozen, $1.50.

Send orders to the

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Home.

TO A SIMPLE HOUSEWIFE.

Who dough shall knead as for God's sake
Shall fill it with celestial leaven,
And every loaf that she shall bake
Be eaten of the blessed in heaven.

—Richard Le Gallienne.

WANTED: A BOY.

Perhaps you have heard about this boy already; for Mr. Winchester is a business man now, and is very fond indeed of telling this story. But, if you have not heard it, I'll tell you as nearly as I can in the way he gave it to us, one evening at dinner, when the conversation had turned on "making one's way in life."

Old Mr. Adams—for so he was called to distinguish him from young Adams, his son, who was in partnership with him—owned a large hardware establishment in a prosperous Massachusetts town. He was rich, and growing steadily richer; for he was as keen and capable as he was kind and honest. Moreover, he had the reputation of being the best of employers toward those in his service. So that when, day after day, that sign, "Wanted: a Boy," appeared so regularly in the Adams window, everybody wondered why the boy wasn't found.

It certainly wasn't for lack of boys. There was a steady stream of them passing through the doorway day after day. Sometimes they left in less than ten minutes, sometimes they stayed all day. But, as regularly as the sun rose and shone on that square little sign, the inquiring "boy" came and went.

"He wants a full-fledged angel, with a dozen pairs of wings,—that's what the old Adam wants," snapped one disappointed fellow, who had been airing his grievances with a little knot of other youngsters on the sidewalk in front.

The boys were shown one by one into his office, and one by one were told what it was that Mr. Adams wanted. That was a trusty, faithful, capable sub-clerk. Of course, each youngster was delighted to find out that it was not merely a boy to run errands, but a genuine assistant clerk that was being sought for. Why the owner of the establishment should be willing to take a boy instead of one of the many grown men who would have been glad of such a place they could not understand. But they could understand that it was a splendid place for a young fellow just beginning life, and all were eager to obtain it.

Andrew Mathers stayed just one day, Frank Scolley one hour, Matt Wyman twenty minutes; and some of the boys who applied never got further than the office door and a three minutes' interview.

What could the matter be? Suppose we see.

Andrew was a bright, pleasant-faced young fellow, and came from a good family. The boys thought that, if any one stood a chance, that one would be Andrew.

"Good-morning, sir," said Mr. Adams, politely, as Andrew entered the office. And the boy answered with his best bow and with his most courteously business-like manner. So far, so good.

Mr. Adams briefly explained that long-felt want, "a boy to be a sort of assistant clerk." Andrew held his head a little higher, as if he already saw himself a real live clerk instead of the drudging boy of all work that he had been before. "And to help around generally, for odds and ends." The young fellow's face fell. That sounded rather too much like an errand-boy's work. But he brightened up, and asked where he should begin. For an hour or two he was busy helping the clerks. By and by Mr. Adams came into the back part of the store, where his new sub-clerk was engaged in marking a keg.

"Almost through there, Mathers?" he asked. "Well, I wish you'd tackle the back storeroom. It's in such confusion, and we've all been too busy to see to it properly."

"You want it put in order?" asked Andrew, doubtfully. He foresaw more sweeping, etc., than seemed dignified for a sub-clerk.

"Yes, it needs it decidedly," and the merchant passed on. He wondered how Andrew would hold out. He was "the best of the lot, so far," he thought regretfully.

For the trial was coming, and by the boy's face it looked rather dubious.

Andrew explored the old back room, and decided on what he considered a most brilliant scheme. Calling the errand-boy aside, he told him about the storeroom, and showed him a bright half-dollar. Jim was tempted, and accepted the offer, promising to have the place ready that afternoon at the earliest hour possible. But there were so many errands to be done that by three o'clock Jim had found not a minute's leisure; and Mr. Adams, as ill luck would have it, happened to go to the storeroom for something he wanted about that time, and discovered the still forlorn condition of matters, and the fact that Andrew had secretly hired Jim to do the work, while he loafed in the front of the store, anxious to show off the fact of his rise in the business world.

And that night Andrew Mathers received a day's wages and a politely regretful dismissal, reason unassigned.

Matt was so careless in his dress, and his hands were so evidently at home with the dust of the earth, that, with a short lecture on cleanliness, he was summarily dismissed.

Joe McCarthy was too rough. The clerks complained of his insolence within half an hour. And Tim McCarthy, his cousin, proved an inveterate liar.

So they came and went, good (in spots), bad, and indifferent.

It was almost two weeks after the sign had first gone up that Charley Winchester applied at the office.

In all that time no boy had seemed to suit. Evidently, the need was not a pressing one: there were plenty of clerks, seemingly, and a fairly good errand-boy. The Adams store seemed able to exist without that peculiar kind of a boy; and yet its owners were still on the war-path, apparently searching for some as yet unheard-of specimen of boyhood.

Charley had not thought of applying at first. He was attending school still, and working hard and steadily every moment outside of school hours; for the Winchester were poor, although they had once known better days. That poverty is the hardest of all to bear, as Charley well knew; and it was his hope and his aim to bring about brighter times as soon as he could.

He was anxious to be in school, for he realized that his education would fit him to fill a higher position than he could find without it. But, after a talk with his principal, with the minister, and the leader of a night school, he found that he could advance as rapidly by attending the evening classes, with the addition of two studies in which the principal could still allow him to continue, as though he were to remain in the high school. And he had learned from the other boys that the sub-clerk was to have two hours a day free for school work, for Mr. Adams knew very well what was the value of an education.

About ten o'clock, on Charley's first morning, Mr. Adams, Sr., came down the store to the counter, where his young sub-clerk was doing up a little bag of nails for Johnny Smith.

Charley smiled pleasantly at the little fellow, and he evidently was as courteous to such customers as to their dignified elders.

"Oh, by the way, Winchester," said Mr. Adams, "I wish you'd tackle the old back storeroom, the ell to the large storeroom we use now. The old one has been waiting some time for a good cleaning out. You can begin when you see a chance, some time." That was leaving Charley quite a margin; and Arthur or Tom, his predecessors, would surely have put it off until a more convenient season,—till to-morrow, at any rate.

But Charley soon found out from the clerks that he was not needed in the store, and would not be, probably, for the rest of the morning; and he went at once on his fateful expedition. He discovered the same chaos which had conquered the explorers before him, but he set resolutely to work. He could not help wondering at, and rather criticising, the carelessness of his employer, though he tried to excuse him as far as he could.

"I suppose he has so much to attend to," he said to himself. There was no one else, unless you counted the rats, who now and then scampered out from their hiding-places to see who their invader was, to whom he could talk. "But, if I were the proprietor, I'd see that my clerks or errand-boys or somebody kept things in order, if I didn't do it myself."

Nevertheless, Charley determined that order must be restored, even at this late day; and how he did work! All the rest of the morning he rolled and piled the barrels and boxes, until he had the "centre of the deck cleared for action," as he put it. Then what do you think he tried next? Something that most boys do not especially enjoy. And how Mr. Adams's eyes danced when he looked in about noon to see young Winchester down on his knees, scrubbing with all his might!

Charley straightened himself with as dignified an air as was possible under such circumstances (his sleeves were rolled up, and he was wearing as an apron a large dusting cloth which happened to be the only clean thing Anderson, one of the clerks, could find for him). He flushed a little, but tried to make his greeting very quietly courteous and indifferent.

"It is rather damp here for you, I fear, Mr. Adams. You will find that place rather soapy. I'm just letting the soap sink in on that spot, as the only way to take it out. Toward the left you will find it dryer, I think."

There was a little defiant ring in the boyish voice, but Mr. Adams could easily pardon that. He knew that boys do not especially enjoy being caught in such attire or doing "girl's work," as some rather foolish fellows choose to designate it.

He noticed that the windows were washed and polished. "And dust and cobwebs have revelled there ever since I thought of this scheme!" thought the owner.

"I couldn't see plain till they were clearer," said Charley, calmly scouring away at a spot where lampblack must have been reposing for years, so indelibly did it seem imprinted there.

"I won't get it done to-day, sir; but you said there was no hurry," Charley went on, devoutly hoping that the proprietor would betake himself elsewhere very speedily; for it is embarrassing to have a man stand by and watch you mop, especially if you can't find any mop-handle, and are obliged to kneel more or less gracefully to the work.

"Oh, no, no hurry,—not in the least," Mr. Adams hastened to assure him.

"And the air was close and dusty. It will be fresh, and easier to breathe here by to-morrow," the new sub-clerk continued, decisively. The decision in his tone was due to the energy with which he was scouring that black spot.

"If I do it at all, I'm going to do it up fine," the young fellow had determined. "And I don't care if the other fellows do think it's woman's work. I don't know why it should be. I consider it harder than waiting on customers. Why, my back's 'most lame now. I don't see how women can do it. I've often done it for mother, only our floors were not so utterly awful as this old storeroom. And it's honest work; and I won't be ashamed of it, so!"

Mr. Adams must have read young Winchester's thoughts. For he was softly chuckling to himself as he went back to the store: "He'll do! he'll do! He thinks it's girls' work, but he won't be ashamed of it; and he is as thorough as can be!"

The next day it was rainy; and there was not much to do in the store, so Charley had a long, busy day in the shed-room. And by night the task was done. Everything was cleaned, sorted, and neatly arranged, and what seemed utterly worthless laid aside in a heap just outside the door, where Mr. Adams could glance at it and see if anything in it proved fit to save.

And young Winchester was retained. The sign did not appear again; for that particular, especial, wonderful, superhuman kind of a "boy" that was "wanted" had certainly been found.

Mr. Adams invited all the applicants into his store one day. The office could not hold them; and he gave them a pleasant but very frank "talk" indeed. And he explained the shed-room scheme,—the rock on which so many had struck; and he gave them some good advice for future service, too. He was interested in boyhood, and he was a thorough business man. Many of the listeners carried its help with them through life, but some of the boys were angry.

"I should say it was a scheme," declared one, angrily, as they talked it over on the grocer's boxes and other loafing places that night.

"I should have thought we'd have caught on to it," complained another.

"Well, he didn't try it on them all, you see. Found out all he wanted to without it. And, then, he had such an off-hand way, we never thought of that old shed's being a test," concluded a third.—Jean Halifax, in Independent.

CANARIES.

About three hundred and fifty years ago a ship, returning from the islands in the Atlantic, which the people then called the Fortunate Isles, but which were undoubtedly the Canaries, went ashore on the coast of Italy, near Leghorn. A cage of beautiful birds, captured in those islands, was broken, and the birds were liberated. Through some caprice, they did not take refuge on the Italian mainland, but went to the island of Elba, where in due time they nested and bred, and increased in numbers. The Italians discovered that they were admirable singers, and began to capture them, and sell them in cages. This gave rise to a traffic which soon completely cleared the island of Elba of "canary birds," so that not one was left there in a wild state.

From that time the history of the canary has been a record of perpetual imprisonment, and of the transformation of his appearance and character. He has become what may well be called an artificial bird. Every nation of Europe has produced a canary of a special type.

In their natural state, as they still exist in the Canary and Madeira and other Atlantic islands, the birds are of a grayish-green or greenish-brown color, and are not remarkable for beauty; but they are such exceedingly energetic singers that they have been known to burst the membrane of their throats in pouring forth their song.

Now and then birds are taken in a wild state in these islands, and sold for good prices in Europe or America. But the ordinary canary of commerce is the offspring of captive stock, and has been greatly modified by breeding. Canaries have, moreover, been crossed with linnets, finches, and other birds, until their real race is uncertain.

Canaries are now known as "German," "French," "Belgian," "English," "Tyrolese," and so on, according to the forms and colors that have been produced in them. The Belgian canaries are sometimes eight inches long,—the wild canary is never more than five,—and are remarkable for the elegance of their form and their rich orange color.

French canaries are light in color. Some of them, which are entirely white, command a high price.

The Germans and Tyrolese, on the other hand, breed more for beauty of song than of plumage. Many of their birds have reverted to the original greenish-brown color; but their powers of song have been developed in a high degree by selection or training. Many of them have been trained by being kept in the dark, in the hearing of nightingales, to imitate those wonderful singers.

A Good Almanac

The Sunlight Almanac

for 1896 contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them. Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents. A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 830).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

For hundreds of these Tyrolese singers a fearful fate is reserved. They are sold to gin-shop keepers in England, who keep them suspended above their bars to make their places "cheerful" and attract custom. In the atmosphere of such a den the bird languishes and dies before many months or years, and another is purchased to take its place.

The "English" bird, so called, is not remarkable for song, but for plumage. To be esteemed highly, it must have a head and body of bright orange, while its wings and tail must be black. A single "wrong" feather will diminish the value of the bird.

Exhibitions of canaries are regularly held in Sydenham Palace, London, and no canary has a chance of winning a prize unless it is properly marked with black wings and tail. The production of them is a great art among breeders, and is attained only by infinite care.

Many books have been written about the canary, and several cases in which birds have been taught to "talk" have been duly recorded. In all these cases, it is fair to suppose, the talking is more or less inarticulate, and requires to be helped out with the imagination of the listener.

A bird in London, named Titchie, which had been neglected from its hatching by its parents, and was reared entirely by human care, was taught to utter a succession of sounds in which people heard the words,—

"Dear, sweet Titchie, kiss Minnie, kissie! kissie! kissie!"

The same bird was taught to whistle clearly the first three bars of "God save the Queen." This, though an unusual accomplishment, is not extremely rare in canaries, finches, linnets, and other birds.

A CHANGE OF MEANING.

There is a common word which has had a curious change in meaning. At one time a "stove" was any place where air was heated, as in a bath or a hot-house. We may find proof of this if we search in the literary strata of three hundred years ago. There we read, for instance, that "when a certain Frenchman came to visit Melanchthon, he found him sitting in his stove," holding his baby with one hand and a book in the other. It seems very ridiculous; but on some clear evening in winter, when you have been out coasting or skating in the pure, wholesome air, and go home to a close room, where people have been sitting in air becoming more and more heated by radiator or register, or perhaps by a coal stove with its escaping fumes and by oil lamps or unfragrant gas, perhaps you will think of the good and learned Melanchthon sitting in his stove, and will feel that it is of very little use to avoid the mistakes against which those other words have warned us, unless we can breathe plenty of good, fresh air.—Zion's Herald.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S PEACH.

A young lady sends to the Chicago Tribune a little anecdote of Abraham Lincoln. She says that a good many years ago, when her father was a small boy, her grandfather brought Abraham Lincoln home one night to supper. He was then a poor young man, practising law in Woodford County, Illinois.

"It was a cold, stormy night; and grandma hurried around getting supper. To have something nice, she opened a jar of preserved peaches. Lincoln spent a long time over his peach, and finally left it on the plate.

"Grandma noticed this; and, as soon as he and grandpa had gone into another room, she went to look at the dish. Then she saw that, instead of a peach, she had given the visitor the little muslin sack which contained the peach kernels and the spice. She hastened into the other room, and began an apology; but Mr. Lincoln said:—

"That was all right, Mrs. Perry. My mother used the same thing, and it was so good that I wanted to get all the juice out of it."

COLLECTIONS.

A New York paper gave not long ago an account of an attractive collection of dolls made by Miss Alden, the young daughter of the editor of Harper's Magazine. Her wish at first was to have a doll dressed in the costume of the country in which it was made. She has more than gained it, as she has now not only little miniature men and women of many nations in appropriate garb, but dolls representing sects and noted individuals on her shelves.

American children and young people are, undoubtedly, the most energetic collectors in the world. There are accumulations in this country both large and costly, not only of the objects usually gathered together, such as seals, autographs, stamps, and postmarks, but of things utterly valueless outside of a collection.

One lad in one of our large cities has cabinets of old shoes, including those worn by noted statesmen and authors, and slippers once belonging to Josephine and to Marie Antoinette. Cigarette pictures are objects of pursuit, and so are buttons, bill-heads, and scraps of gowns worn by noted women.

Nearly all young people who have begun to gather collections of objects have found that the desire to help them by friends, acquaintances, and even strangers, is almost universal.

If the pursuit, then, is easy as well as fascinating, why not choose an object to collect which is of interest in itself? The dolls, in their national or individual costume, are a lesson of historic importance. But cigarette pictures surely convey little significance except to dealers in tobacco.

In the great National Museum at Amsterdam one of the most interesting apartments is that in which may be seen miniature houses with glass sides, which represent the dwellings of wealthy burghers, of nobles, and of peasants during four centuries. Each apartment is accurately furnished, and the dolls and figures representing the people of these centuries are dressed in the costumes of their time. It is an object-lesson of the social history of Holland of great value. It was begun by a child, continued by his father, and is now in charge of the government.

When zeal and money can accomplish great results, why waste them on valueless rubbish?—Youth's Companion.

A QUEER CORN-POPPER.

"Here are six ears of pop-corn left. We'll use them to-night," said grandma; and she gave them to Rob, telling him to put them with the corn-popper.

Grandma didn't tell Rob where that was, for she kept forgetting that he had not been there since he was a baby, and did not know where things were kept. Off the little boy went, and nothing more was said about the pop-corn until evening. Then grandma said,—

"If Rob will go down cellar and get some apples, I will get the corn and the popper."

Back she came with the popper, but no corn.

"Didn't you put it with the popper, Rob?"

"Yes, ma'am, but not with that one: it's in the one that stands by the tall clock in your room."

"What, Rob?"

Off went Rob to the room so full of queer things; a tall clock, a bed with curtains, and the spinning-wheel grandma's grandma used. And what do you think he brought back? A warming-pan with six ears of corn in it. How everybody laughed, until grandpa said:—

"Never mind, Rob. It does look like a corn-popper, doesn't it? I'll tell you what they used that for. It was to warm up cold beds for little boys, and we'll warm yours to-night with it. Bring it to me, and I'll explain it.

"This stout brass pan held the hot coals. Then this cover with so many little round holes shut down to keep them in; and this long handle made it easy to slip the hot pan up and down between the cold sheets. How I did like to see my mother put the hot coals into the warming-pan! It was cold going to bed in those days. That was long before there was a furnace in the house. We had fireplaces downstairs, but no fires upstairs. As soon as we finish our apples and corn, we'll try the warming-pan."

Sure enough, when it was bedtime, grandpa and Rob tipped the cover back on the hinge. Grandpa put in a few ashes, so the pan should not become hot enough to scorch the sheets, then some live coals; and Rob put down the cover.

And they warmed three beds that were already warm, just to show Rob how little boys were made comfortable cold nights a hundred years ago.—Gertrude L. Stone, in Youth's Companion.

LITTLE PHEASANTS.

"Walking down a road in Ceylon one morning with a neighbor," says a writer in Nature, "I suddenly noticed a little ball of fluff between my feet; and I could hardly avoid stepping on it, as it stuck close to me. Almost immediately another appeared at my friend's feet; and we saw they were newly hatched pheasants, the mother probably carried off by some wild-cat. As it was difficult to walk with these little things running so close and in the way, we lifted them into the short grass alongside, and hurried on some fifty yards. On returning, we had forgotten them; but one ran out, and so pertinaciously stuck to my boots that, to save it, I put it into my pocket, and on our arrival at the bungalow tried to feed it with small fragments of hard-boiled egg, rice, and white ants. Of all these it took no notice. Next morning the other chick was found at the foot of the bungalow steps, having probably followed us unnoticed the day before. I then called my 'babu,' as I could not get them to eat; and he said, 'They must be taught.' He put the gauze wire cover they were under and the crushed rice, egg, etc., on a hard-wood table; and, taking a pencil from his pocket, and collecting the eatables together, close to the edge of the gauze cover, he lifted its edge, and, with the pencil point inserted, began sharply tapping among the rice débris. The two chicks at once ran over to that place, and bent over, watching the tapping; and, to our astonishment, they began tapping with their little beaks in the same way, and before long had begun to feed on their own account, just as the 'babu' had predicted, and after that lesson we had no trouble."

Never to tire, never to grow cold, to be patient, sympathetic, tender, to look for the budding flower and the opening heart, to hope always, to love always,—this is duty.—Amiel.

General Harrison's First Article

In his series on

"THIS COUNTRY OF OURS"

is in the current (December) issue of

The Ladies' Home Journal

EVERYBODY IS READING IT

Ten Cents

On Any News=stand

The Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia

THOMAS TREADWELL STONE, D.D.

"He is a man with a most remarkable combination of qualities." Such were the words of the late Dr. Ezra Abbot concerning the revered and saintly man who died last Wednesday in his quiet home in Bolton, Mass. In the sixteen years since Dr. Abbot made the remark, I have often recalled it as exceptionally pertinent. His mind was a storehouse of riches; and it was a great delight to sit by him in these latter years, while he opened, without reserve and yet without ostentation, its treasures old and new. In such delightful communion one could not fail to find that Hebrew prophet, Grecian mystic, and American patriot were here united in a "strong son of God." Among the many good men and true whom I have known, he was perhaps most "as a little child"; and truly the riches of the kingdom of heaven were in his heart. He lived a life of love toward all men. Slow to believe ill of man or nation, abounding in charity for all, his whole nature revolted against injustice and iniquity. When speaking of these, his frail body took on a new aspect. It became tremulous, as though a new life was coursing through it. The face lit with the spirit's glow. Language, always free and rich, rose to a greater dignity. The whole aspect of the man, as well as consideration of what he said, made a hearer feel the meanness, the utter ugliness, of all injustice.

I write of him only as I have known him in the quiet of his retirement from active life. Others can better tell of the earlier years. Here he was lovable and gracious, always interested in the new life around him. Though secluded and rejoicing in the still air of delightful study and contemplation, he was no recluse, and never for a moment lost his grip upon the present nor his sympathy with men young and active. That there was change he was glad. It was the good order of the immanent God that there should be change, and for the better, on the whole.

On those rare occasions when he met with the Worcester Association it was delightful to note the sympathy that was always shown between him and the youngest men. The last time he met with that Association was after a message of sympathy had been sent to him in an hour of affliction. The thought that it "might be the last word" found utterance; and then he spoke with simplicity and beauty of his gratitude for the message received, ending with a grand word of hope and encouragement. "I am glad," he said, in substance, "to see the young men of to-day coming forward to take up the great problems which they must meet and face, better fitted than it was possible for us of the generation now almost gone to be when we took up those which were ours." May all of whom he spoke as "better fitted" be as faithful to their trust as was this blessed man who so tenderly gave us his parting benediction!

In the winter of 1880, soon after the death of his wife, for whom he thought it "not wrong to mourn, though I would not repine in the memory and presence of so many blessings," in a private letter he wrote: "I feel as if I should preach quite otherwise than I commonly did if I could only have the opportunity brought back. Especially do I feel that I should more clearly and earnestly present, not 'doctrines' of the Church nor 'views' of Unitarians or any others, but the divine beauty of true virtue, of justice and mercy, and likeness to Him who is Love." Such counsel as this is the seed, already beginning to show fruit, of a new era in the Church, when pride of opinion will cease to hold men apart who are one in the "love of true virtue, of justice and mercy, and likeness to Him who is Love!"

C. A. R.

THE CHURCH'S OPPORTUNITY.

This is one of the burning questions of the hour, and its right answer involves the future welfare alike of the Church and what it stands for. From time to time, among much that is commonplace, we have an utterance full of vigor, wisdom, and vitality. A notable example of the latter is seen in the paper by Canon Barnett in the September Contemporary Review. Though he writes from the standpoint of the Anglican Church, what he says will apply with equal force to churches of every name. The Church's opportunity which he has in mind "is the Church of England, as by law established." Personally, he believes that the Church cannot be effective and justify its national position unless it submit to further reform; but, as much can be done with the Church as it now exists, the canon gives himself to outlining the means of doing what is most needed. Among the pressing problems for solution, he cites "the two nations of the rich and poor, of which Disraeli wrote," who have developed their characteristics; and, after vividly sketching the spirit and features of these two classes and how they resent each other, he points out the Church's opportunity, and asks, "How can that organization, whose aim is a righteous nation, whose methods are worship, teaching, and charity, bring together rich and poor, raise the fallen, and comfort the sad?"

The Church, by its buildings, its music, its services, its sacraments, puts men into this attitude of worship, collects and lifts up their thoughts. "What a great gain it would be, toward the solution of some of the social problems, if both rich and poor learned to go more humbly, if they from self would cease! What a relief it would be to the sad and broken-hearted if they could be lifted out of themselves!" But the majority of the people do not so worship; and the fault is largely on the side of the Church, which has not fitted the means to the times. These remain the same, although the fashion, the thought, the whole organization of society, have changed. The Church might surely offer out of its resources means of worship which would capture minds fed on the food of the nineteenth century, and subdue their vanity. The teachers sent by the Church have, therefore, to interpret Christ of the first century to the people of the nineteenth century. They have to give him a form which may be recognized and a voice which may be understood by contemporaries. They have to make him present. It is not wanted that they should take either one side or the other in the controversy between the rich and the poor. If in the past they have been too often on the side of the rich, it will not mend matters if now they exclusively take the side of the poor. A "Labor Church" will not right the wrong done by a "Capital Church." It is not wanted, either, that the teachers should be arbitrators in disputes, interfering in things outside their experience. What is wanted is that they should interpret to rich and poor, to masters and to men, the power which by pricks makes itself felt in all alike, and gives a voice to the call which, sweeping as a wind over society, makes the stronger things of the earth to shake and the light things to bow. After alluding to the charitable agencies which the Church has promoted and the good work which they have done, he thinks they would now complete their career of self-sacrifice by the extinction of themselves. Then the Church would have at its disposal the men and women whose energies are now absorbed by the old societies, and who would be free to act either as individuals or as members of new societies in connection with State and municipal action.

Charities and Reforms.

The sixtieth annual report of the Industrial Aid Society for the Prevention of Pauperism shows steady work along their usual lines. The number of people given work is the largest since 1854. A trial has been made of the Detroit plan of cultivating vacant lots free of charge in or near the city, and the report given is interesting. The results of the undertaking have been very satisfactory.

The South Friendly Fair in aid of the charities and hospitalities of the South Congregational Church will be held in the vestry on Thursday, December 12, from 10 A.M. to 10 P.M. There will be tables of fancy and useful articles, books, original poems, and pictures, housekeeping articles, including preserves and jellies, a Sunday-school table, with home-made candy, and a café. The object-lesson table, under the charge of Dr. Hale's "Welcome and Correspondence Club," will be a unique feature. It will contain articles produced more or less directly by the members of the congregation. The largest latitude is allowed. The ladies may give a picture or jar of mince-meat: the gentlemen may give woollen cloths, India-rubbers, or bank stock.

AMERICAN PURITY ALLIANCE CONFERENCE IN BOSTON.—The American Purity Alliance has arranged to hold a conference in Boston in the Young Men's Christian Association Hall, December 9 and 10, kindred in character to the late National Purity Congress in Baltimore. Following the opening address by the president of the Alliance, Aaron M. Powell, addresses of welcome will be delivered by Bishop William Lawrence (the successor of Phillips Brooks) and President Sawyer, of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association. Among those who will address the conference are Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, upon "Moral Equality between the Sexes"; William Lloyd Garrison, "The Relation of Poverty to Purity"; Mrs. Mary A. Livermore; Rev. Dr. W. T. Sabine of New York, "Social Vice and National Decay"; Rev. Antoinette Brown Blackwell, "Immortality of the Regulation System"; Rev. Dr. S. H. Virgin of New York, "The Religious Aspects of the Purity Movement"; Henry B. Blackwell, editor of the Woman's Journal,

"Equal Suffrage as Related to the Purity Movement"; Mrs. Anna Rice Powell, corresponding secretary, "The American Purity Alliance and its Work"; Rev. Dr. A. H. Lewis of Plainfield, N. J., "The Sacredness of Fatherhood"; Rev. Mary H. Whitney of Boston; and others.

Education.

A congress on Africa is to be held in Atlanta in connection with the Exposition, December 13-15. It is to be under the direction of the Stewart Missionary Foundation for Africa in Gammon Theological Seminary, and a long list is announced of speakers. These include representative men of both races who are interested in the Negro problems, both in Africa and in this country.

The general theological library is now permanently established in its new building, 53 Mt. Vernon Street. It has never been so well accommodated with rooms for all purposes, but the greatly increased accommodations involve much larger expenses. Therefore, the institution, being but partially endowed, needs to be constantly remembered by those who have the means to aid a worthy cause. Its fund for the purchase of new books should be greatly increased. The library is a great help to the pastors of churches of every denomination, to authors, to theological students, to Sunday-school teachers, and to all readers of a Christian literature; and its books have been circulated in more than five hundred towns and villages in twelve different States. Many churches in town and throughout New England have become perpetual members of the society, whereby all of their pastors forever may use the library and draw books gratis. If a much larger number should become members, the institution would be greatly strengthened and increased in usefulness. It can be aided, also, by donations by persons becoming founders, patrons, and honorary, corporate, life, and annual members.

Science.

It should be mentioned, in the interests of antiseptic purity and suffering humanity, that a good, stout tooth-brush, plenty of water, and some antiseptic dentifrice, applied morning and night, afford a greater safeguard against more diseases than many people are aware.

In the Popular Science Monthly for December Prof. G. Frederick Wright furnishes new evidence of glacial man in Ohio. The discoverer was Mr. Samuel Huston, a graduate of the scientific department in Jefferson College. This gentleman, a public surveyor, has aided scientific men a good deal by collecting fossils in his neighborhood; and it was he "discovered" for Prof. Samuel H. Scudder the fossil insects of the coal measures which attracted so much attention two or three years ago." The discovery now reported consists of a chipped implement one inch and three-quarters long and three-quarters of an inch wide in its broadest part, evidently intended for a knife. This instrument was exhibited at the American Association for the Advancement of Science last August; and such experts as Prof. F. W. Putnam, Mr. F. H. Cushing, and Miss Alice Fletcher testified to its antiquity. All the indications show that the implement was deposited with the material of the terrace in which it was found. A few years ago, had such a discovery been announced, it would have been attacked in the pulpit and in the religious press as inconsistent with the record in Genesis; but it is not likely to-day that anybody will make it a matter of pulpit denunciation. We are slowly coming to understand that there is an older Genesis than that written by Moses, and that the calculations of the antiquity of the earth derived from the Biblical legends are as imaginative as the tales they are connected with.

Shines Silver Surprisingly
Electro-Silicon SILVER POLISH
Never Scratches
Never Wears
Leading Grocers sell it.
THE ELECTRO-SILICON CO.,
72 John St., New York

"CLEANLINESS IS NAE PRIDE, DIRT'S NAE HONESTY." COMMON SENSE DICTATES THE USE OF SAPOLIO

Nausea,

✱ Sea-Sickness.

Both due to an unnatural condition of the vital organs, caused by unwonted surroundings or excesses, either an unnecessary generation of the gastric juices or a partial suspension of the natural functions of the life-generating parts, in other words a state of mal-nutrition with its ever accompanying unpleasant sensations. For such a sickness get nourishment, take the weakest stomach retains it. It's a concentration into the least possible bulk of the vital elements of lean beef, it nourishes and starts every organ of the body on its normal duty with no apparent effort; this done, bad feelings vanish. Mr. J. A. Blackman, 123 E. 88th St., N. Y., writes: "Sailing from here last August for Europe, tried every antidote for sea-sickness, and I found yours the only successful one. On my return also used it when I suffered no ill effects at all."

Bovinine

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Give Silver.

For Christmas presents there is nothing more suitable. Articles in silver plate are especially adapted for gifts, as the quality is so well known. In design and finish, this celebrated plate equals the best solid silver. And it wears.

Meriden Britannia Co's

On spoons, forks, etc., our trade mark is "1847 Rogers Bros."

If you cannot procure these goods of your dealer, write us and we will give necessary information.
Meriden Britannia Co., Meriden, Conn.
New York, Chicago, San Francisco.

XMAS DIALOGUES, Pieces to Speak and how to get up Fascinating Sunday School Entertainment—all 10c.
J. & P. B. MYERS, 85 John St., N. Y.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

Parties will leave Boston Jan. 23 and Feb. 13 for Two Grand Tours of 72 days through the Southern States.

MEXICO AND CALIFORNIA

In Special Pullman Vestibuled Trains of Sleeping, Dining, and Composite Library Observation Cars.

Ample time will be given to all the leading cities and other places of historic and picturesque interest in Mexico, including the Wonderful Tampus Division of the Mexican Central Railway, a Week in the City of Mexico, and a Four Days' Trip over the Vera Cruz Railway.

In California, San Diego, Los Angeles, Santa Monica, Santa Barbara, San Francisco, Monterey, etc., will be visited.

The return tickets may be used from California on Any Regular Train until July, or with any one of Ten Parties under Special Escort, with a Choice of Three Different Routes.

Tours to California, Mexico, omitting California, Florida, Japan, China, and the Sandwich Islands, Washington, and Lookout Mountain, Old Point Comfort, Gettysburg, etc.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular tour desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

A TRIBUTE TO DR. S. F. SMITH.

The Rev. Samuel May of Leicester, Mass., was a classmate of Rev. Dr. S. F. Smith, and in a letter to the Boston Journal says:—

When your representative came last evening to tell me of the sudden death of my friend and classmate, Dr. Samuel F. Smith, it was almost too much for belief; for I had left his house at Newton Centre only a few hours before, and had exchanged with him farewells with reference to a journey to Iowa, which he was preparing to take this week. He had come to the door with me, and helped me at the steps. He was to all appearances in firm health and excellent spirits, and he was to go at four o'clock to a neighboring town to preach to-day. We are slow to learn what a day, what an hour, may bring forth.

I passed the hour from one to two o'clock with him and his family. He was never more himself,—cheerful, full of faith and of courage,—rehearsed in a happy way several recent personal occurrences which had given him great pleasure, showed me some tokens of love and respect which had come to him from East and West, and referred to his two visits abroad, especially to his short stay in Athens and in India.

How, then, can I respond to your request for a tribute to his memory? But I swiftly remember that none is needed,—none, surely, for his sake. Has not the whole nation, within a few months, spoken out in his honor and praise with one consenting acclaim, such as is granted only to one man in millions? And will not his noble hymn, "My Country, 'tis of thee," continue in the future to swell that chorus, and keep his name in grateful and fragrant remembrance?

Before and beyond and above all that was his beautiful character. He had that charity of which Saint Paul says it is greater than faith or hope, but which so few of Paul's professed admirers even now either believe or understand. He practised it. From the time of our Latin School days in Boston, where I sat with him for three years, through our college days, in our very intimate class associations, ever since, no flaw in that friendly, helpful, brotherly nature has ever been seen. He was the very soul of generous good will.

Whatever his outward connections, whatever his creeds,—and he never swerved in them,—the perfect charity, the practical recognition of every man's "soul liberty"—which is the great honor of the Baptist body, to which he "belonged," as we say—dominated the whole. If I wrote on endlessly, I could say no more, no better, than that. The blessings of multitudes whom he has helped and comforted and uplifted, and guided into the ways of peace and into the kingdom of God, are his forever. He has suddenly gone on a longer journey than that he was anticipating; but his feet were shod for it with the apostolic preparation. Fearful is the shock of parting; but, when it is passed, will not his friends, will not his nearest and most loved ones, say, This man was as happy in his death, and in the manner and time of it, as ever in his life?

AUGUSTUS WOODBURY, D.D.

In the First Congregational Church, Providence, the pastor, Rev. Augustus M. Lord, referred in a sermon to Mr. Woodbury as follows:—

"To-day you and I are thinking together of still another leader of our thought and life,—one whose face and presence was known in this city for thirty-five years. How much of your life, the strength and the joy of it, you must owe to such a man, whether you are conscious of it or not! How much of his life must have gone out into yours to make it more abundant, more deep and wide and full!

"This is not the place, nor am I the man, to speak of that thirty-five years of service in detail, of all that Dr. Woodbury accomplished for his city, his State, and his country. It is written in the hearts of those of you who lived through these strenuous years with him. But I, who knew him only at the last, may yet speak of the winning force of his personal character which made itself felt upon me as upon you.

"And the winsomeness, the masterfulness of it, seem to me to lie in the breadth and constancy and steadiness of his spiritual vision. He was always the same, the man at the heart of it all. He had his vision, his ideal, of religion, of the Church; and no circumstances ever moved him to change or lower it, or to think that another method or another gospel was better because for the moment it happened to be more popular. The reality for him was in his conviction, not in the numbers he could win to it.

"He had his vision of the perfect community and the perfect nation, and no Hebrew prophet was ever more courageous in declaring it to men; and always from reverse or disappointment he fell back on his vision, his conviction, which was as real to him as to most men are the walls of brick and stone, the wealth of gold or silver, which they may see with their eyes or handle with their hands.

"He had his vision of the meaning of human life, the purpose for which he was put into the world; and no pain of body could ever conquer or turn aside the spirit that followed after that vision. I remember the last time he spoke from this pulpit he was in such suffering that he had to sit instead of stand as he preached; and yet none of you who heard could suspect his physical pain, as his deep, clear voice spoke to you the message, of what?—the message that the world was a vale of tears, that pain was dreadful, and that by and by there should be no pain? No, not a word of that! The message of the beauty of the quiet life which no pain could move. That was the man."

Spiritual Life.

They serve God best who do well their simple duties,—not some fanciful sacrifice at a distance, but the plain, homely, everyday task that lies before them.—Religious Herald.

The love and aspiration which once really existed live forever before God, and in him ye shall find the fruit thereof; that is, to all eternity it shall be better for you than if you had never felt them.—J. Tauler.

Be as free, be as liberal, be as courageous as you will; but be religious because you are liberal, be devout because you are free, be pure because you are bold. Cast away the works of darkness because you are the children of light.—Dean Stanley.

The varied relationships in which people meet in a complex civilization must give the characteristic of the higher religious unity. The earlier and cruder method was to unite by external pressure, crushing out individuality. The higher union is the weaving of many threads into a seamless fabric.—S. M. Crothers.

Never lose an opportunity of seeing anything beautiful. Beauty is God's handwriting,—a wayside sacrament. Welcome it in every fair face, every fair sky, every fair flower, and thank him for it who is the fountain of loveliness, and drink it in simply and earnestly with your eyes: it is a charmed draught, a cup of blessing.—Ruskin.

The Love which created possesses and rules the world. It is not the devil's world, but God's world; and he is in it, bringing out the permanent good against the dark foil of the transient evil, promoting every right endeavor, conserving every right achievement, and suffering no pure purpose and aspiration to fail of their final aim.—Philip Moxom.

To recognize with delight all high and generous and beautiful actions; to find a joy even in seeing the good qualities of your bitterest opponents, and to admire those qualities even in those with whom you have least sympathy,—be it either the Romanist or the Unitarian,—this is the only spirit that can heal the love of slander and calumny.—F. W. Robertson.

Yesterday's conscience will not do for to-day's need, nor to-day's for to-morrow's. Conscience is a thing which must be growing all the time,—must grow with our growth, strengthen with our strength. If it be stationary, it becomes stagnant, it deteriorates, it may die. It must be kept up, its tone always equal to our best individual advances.—The Presbyterian.

SOMATOSE-BISCUIT

containing 10% Somatose, are made only by The American Biscuit & Manufacturing Co., New York.

Somatose is a scientific food, consisting of the albumoses, the elements essential for proper nourishment. It is concentrated, palatable, easily digestible, and quickly assimilated, promoting a rapid gain in flesh and strength.

Somatose-Biscuit are obtainable from all druggists.

Send for descriptive pamphlets to the makers, or to Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents.

Timely Warning.

The great success of the chocolate preparations of the house of Walter Baker & Co. (established in 1780) has led to the placing on the market many misleading and unscrupulous imitations of their name, labels, and wrappers. Walter Baker & Co. are the oldest and largest manufacturers of pure and high-grade Cocoas and Chocolates on this continent. No chemicals are used in their manufactures.

Consumers should ask for, and be sure that they get, the genuine Walter Baker & Co.'s goods.

WALTER BAKER & CO., Limited,
DORCHESTER, MASS.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S
BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS.

The Bible: Its Origin, Growth, and Character. pp. 300. G. F. Putnam's Sons, publishers. Price $1.50.

The Liberal Ministry as a Calling. I. For Young Men. II. For Young Women. pp. 96. Geo. H. Ellis, publisher. Price 50 cents.

One Upward Look Each Day. Poems of Faith and Hope. (Compilation.) Morocco, 75 cents; cloth, 50 cents; paper, 30 cents. Special edition in morocco, containing marriage certificate, 75 cents.

What do Unitarians Believe? pp. 16. Nineteenth Thousand. Price, 10 cents a dozen; 75 cents a hundred.

Unitarianism: Its History, Present Condition, and Prospects. pp. 16. Twenty-fifth Thousand. Price, 10 cents a dozen; 75 cents a hundred.

Is the Bible Infallible? pp. 40. Tenth Thousand. Price, 5 cents a copy; $2.00 a hundred.

Mr. Sunderland's College Town Pulpit is necessarily suspended during his year abroad, but is to be resumed on his return. The next number may be expected in September, 1896. Back numbers (sermons for 1894-95) can be furnished to order. Subjects: 1. "The Soul's Cry for God"; 2. "Jesus as Humanity's Ideal"; 3. "Sectarianism: Its Causes and Cure"; 4. "The True Cross of Christ"; 5. "Was Jesus God? How did he come to be worshipped?" 6. "Loyalty to Conviction"; 7. "Is Life a Blessing?" 8. "Mr. Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible"; 9. "A Religion for a Republic"; 10. "The Surest Way of doing Good."

Price per sermon, 5 cents.

*.*Any of the above publications may be obtained from the publishers, or by sending orders to Miss J. S. GREGG, Ann Arbor, Mich.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.

If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites
many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods
in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus,
love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR DECEMBER.

"The Wilderness shall be Glad." Rev. Francis B. Hornbrook.

The Theology of Unitarians. Dr. Charles Carroll Everett.

Concord. H. Hayes Robbins.

Christmas Day. William Brunton.

Merit Recovery. Rev. Eli Fay, D.D.

Daily Sacrifice. Rev. Stopford W. Brooke.

The Open Vision. Rev. George H. Hosmer.

Like and Unlike.

The Outlook for Christian Union. W. H. Ramsay.

Installing a Minister. N. M. Brigham.

The National Conference. M. J. Savage.

Unity and Diversity. J. S. Lee.

Always Growing.

One Upward Look Each Day.

Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor; Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Alice P. Jackson; Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Elliot; Literary Notes—Some Books.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*.*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.
3. Reaping Time.
4. Called to be Saints.
5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)
6. The Religious Situation.
7. The Forward Movement of Unitarianism. (By Rev. George Batchelor.)
8. Our Divine Partnership.
9. Dr. Gordon's Book, "The Christ of To-day."
10. Thanks that I can be Thankful.
11. The Moving Song of the Creation. (By Rev. Robert Collyer.)

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.
2. The Beseeching God.
3. Christian Unity.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Pleasantries.

Ninety-five: "Say, Blanks, have you read 'Romeo and Juliet'?" Ninety-six: "I've read 'Romeo,' and I intend taking up 'Juliet' soon."—Exchange.

A little girl, somewhat noted for her quaint and original sayings, said the other day at the breakfast table that "she had got a piece of bread head first down her cough-pipe."—Standard.

Bessie Norris: "Oh, dear! I wish I could ride a bicycle." Grace Quint: "Well, there's no law to prevent your doing so." Bessie: "Only the law of gravitation."—The Standard.

Martha had gone off to learn a geography lesson; and mamma, missing her, inquired, "Where's Martha?" "Oh," replied Jamie, "she's in her room studying her forgotaphy."—Youth's Companion.

Kathi (in the museum, viewing the Venus de Milo): "Sepp, see here: they have knocked both arms off this woman." Sepp: "Come, let's get out, or they'll suspect that we have done it."—Fliegende Blätter.

A little girl heard a sermon from the words, "My cup runneth over; surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life." On returning home, she was asked if she could remember the minister's text, and replied: "Yes, indeed. It was this: 'Mercy! Goodness! My cup's tipped over.'"—Exchange.

This story is told of the late Dr. Edward Beecher: On one occasion he was dining with friends, and inadvertently took a mouthful of exceedingly hot coffee. Immediately he deposited it upon his plate, and, turning around, remarked in a way characteristic of all the Beechers, "A fool would have swallowed it."—Universalist.

"Have you 'Japan Saw-na-dass'?" (accent on last syllable.) "What is it, madam?" asked the clerk in the music store of the lady who had propounded the conundrum. "Have you a book called 'Japan Saw-na-dass'?" "Yes, certainly, we have it," replied the quick-witted clerk, as he brought her a copy of "Chopin's Sonatas."—Etude.

I have before me a letter from a Parisian friend, a gentleman of some literary note in his own country, who informs me that he is learning English by the aid of a small text-book and a dictionary, without any other instructor; and he adds, "in small time I can learn so many English as I think I will come at the America and go on the scaffold to lecture."—Detroit Free Press.

A clergyman was explaining to a class of boys the passage of Scripture, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." He told them that this very strong expression was meant to show the extreme difficulty, adding, "You know it would be impossible for a camel to go through the eye of a needle." "Of course it would, sir, on account of its hump," responded the naturalist of the class.—La Fame.

An old Scotch woman, who had never heard about or seen a telephone, went into a butcher's shop for a rabbit. The butcher had two shops which were connected by telephone. As they did not have a rabbit in that shop, they telephoned to the other shop, and had one sent up. The old lady, on meeting a friend, said to her: "I've just been at the butcher's for a rabbit; and he gaed to a hole in the wa', an' said, 'Bring up a rabbit.' And in twa or three meenits in comes a laddie wi' a rabbit. Ma certie, I'll no eat it: it's no cannie. Ye can dae what ye like wi't."—Evangelist.

OBEYING ORDERS.

The late Prof. Huxley used to enforce upon young men the lesson of definiteness by telling them a story of his own experience. He was attending a meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science at Belfast, Ireland.

All the savans in the town assembled regularly at a certain hall. Prof. Huxley, having been up late one evening, rose late in the morning, and feared he should be late at the meeting. Coming out of his lodgings, he hailed one of the Irish vehicles known as an outside car, and mounted it.

"Now drive fast," he said to the driver, "for I am in a great hurry."

Off went the driver at a mad pace, which almost threw the professor off his seat, and began charging along the road in a somewhat indefinite way. Presently it occurred to Huxley to say, as he held on for his life,—

"My good man, do you know where I want to go?"

"No, yer anner," answered the driver, coolly. "You didn't tell me where to go; but, annyway, I am driving fast!"—Youth's Companion.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder
ABSOLUTELY PURE

Vacuum Oil Company.

THE OIL THAT LUBRICATES MOST.

45 Purchase St., BOSTON. Telephone 1839.

EMBROIDERING FLOWERS
NEW BLUE BOOK
giving full directions for embrodering over 80 different flowers, leaves and fruits, showing the colors of silk to be used. SENT to any foreign address for 4 cents in stamps.
The Brainerd & Armstrong Silk Co., 2 Union St., New London, Conn.

THE BEST SILVERWARE
in quality and finish.
New and desirable patterns
many of which cannot be found elsewhere.

Bigelow, Kennard & Co.
511 Washington St. cor. West.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM
DANVILLE, New York

Established in 1858.
A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

ORGANIST.

A Harvard man, experienced, is open to engagement as organist. Address E. M. J., Box 348, Boston Post-office.

THE FRENCH BARGAIN TABLES.

Each year the Abram French practice of classifying Odd, Sample, and Broken Lots of High Grade Crockery, China and Glassware by "Price Tables" grows more popular. A greater display of really choice Gift Pieces is offered in this way this season than was ever known in Boston before. It is simply astonishing what a little money can secure.

50 CENTS BUYS

A handsome German Ware Plate (blue),
A Rudolstadt Vase, marked from $1,
A "Public Garden," Boston Wm E. Loy Co.,
A Quaint German Beer Mug,
An Austrian Ware "Orchid" Cup and Saucer,
A Glass Base Caster with 4 bottles.

$1 BUYS

A leaf-pattern Cordial Set of 8 pieces,
A French China Tea Caddy,
An Ice Cream (Carlsbad) Set of 7 pieces,
A Flemish Beer Tankard,
A Oatmeal Set (Haviland, Limoges),
A hand-painted "Landscape" Plate.

These are mere suggestions of the extent and variety shown.

Tables marked 25c, 50c, 75c, $1, $2, $3 and $5.

ABRAM FRENCH COMPANY,

CROCKERY, CHINA, GLASS AND SILVERWARE MERCHANTS,

89, 91, 93 Franklin St., BOSTON.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES.

JOHN H. PRAY, Sons & Co., CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY, 658 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.
POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.
ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.
LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

GEO. H. ELLIS,
Printer,
141 FRANKLIN ST.
BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1895.

NUMBER 50.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,

141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Mambrino's Helmet,	813
The Idea of God; Women as Overseers of the Poor,	814
MUSINGS,	814
BREVITIES,	815
PRO AND CON.
An Inadvertence,	815
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
The Everlasting Reality of Religion, by John Fiske, LL.D.,	815
Russia as it is, by Sophie Friedland; The Indians and the Dawes Bill, by John J. Janney,	817
Rev. Charles Ware Park; American Unitarian Association,	818
Three Essex County Ministers; Rev. O. B. Frothingham,	826
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	818
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	818
SERMON GLEANINGS.
Spiritual Insight,	820
LITERATURE.
"Stops of Various Quills"; Other Book Notices,	820
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes,	822
Books Received,	823
THE HOME.
That Miss Benton,	824
Tommy's Procession, by R. P. U.; A Story of Lincoln, &c.,	825
POETRY.
Natural Religion,	815
The Voice of the Helpless,	824
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	826
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	827
EDUCATION,	827
SCIENCE,	827
HERE AND THERE,	827
PLEASANTRIES,	828

Editorial.

If any further proof had been needed of the utter demoralization of the sultan's government, it was furnished a few days ago, when Said Pasha fled from the palace, and took refuge in the English embassy. What ground the Armenians have for fearing the government may be imagined when a Turk of such rank and influence is compelled to fly for his life to a European embassy. Next to the sultan's letter to Lord Salisbury, this act of Said Pasha has revealed more to the outside world of what is going on behind the scenes at Constantinople than any number of newspaper despatches. If affairs at Constantinople are growing worse, those in the interior are growing no better; and we are cut off here from the information which we may get from the capital. No one knows what horrors have been perpetrated in the mountains of Armenia in the last few weeks, or what suffering from cold and hunger are endured, under a government which is hardly able to keep itself together, and whose soldiers and officers have now full range to murder and rapine. But that several European nations, stayed by diplomatic courtesy and fired by mutual jealousy, should look on, and allow the Armenians to be exterminated, is a spectacle almost as sad as the horrors furnished by their extermination. It is not surprising, therefore, that the New York Nation, which seldom indulges in military rhetoric, should say: "A single division of cavalry in Asia Minor would be worth more to the Christians than all the fleets put together. Failing this, every effort should be made to supply the Armenians with arms and ammunition."

THE new movement in Boston noticed recently in these columns in the way of a protest against the present condition of the theatre in this country has attracted the attention of the Congregationalist. It devotes a leading editorial to the subject, the tone of which presents a striking contrast to that in which the theatre has often been treated by the religious press. Our contemporary says: "The confessed demoralizing influence of the theatre has kept the majority of Christian churches opposed to it as an institution, and that is their position to-day. Yet the playhouse is not now more positively antagonized by the churches than was the novel in the early part of this century; and now, while immoral and intellectually debasing stories have an immense circulation, novels fill our Sunday-school libraries, and the high and powerful mission of fiction is discussed freely in our churches, novelists themselves being invited to set forth the relation of their work to the life of the spirit. Mrs. Margaret Deland spoke at Shawmut Church, Boston, on a recent Sunday evening, on 'The Mission of the Novel.'"

It is not too much to assume that in the vast number of those who go to the theatre a good proportion of church-going people are now represented. Indeed, while Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, and Orthodox Congregationalists, as church organizations, stand in antagonism to theatrical representations, many members of these churches may and do attend the theatre without sacrificing their church connections. "Indeed," says our contemporary, "dramatic entertainments are also not wholly foreign to orthodox Sunday-school celebrations, and not a few Christians speak of wholesome plays they have witnessed with benefit and pleasure. If these could be wholly divorced from the theatre as an institution whose influence is confessedly evil, they would prize them as an innocent recreation and a valuable mental stimulant." But the danger and the probability is that the churchly theatre-goers will accept the drama pretty much as it is, demanding a higher standard of cleanliness, but nothing more, so that little improvement from a literary or artistic point of view is to be expected from this direction. The Church in this country has done little that we can think of for art as art, and has often stood in the way of art's doing what it might for religion. Yet there are immense moral forces latent in the theatre, and the time may come when religion and the drama may be as closely identified as they were in the early days of the Greek theatre, when the altar was in the very centre of the orchestra, now called the stage.

THE difficulties of the independent voter in politics become apparent when he goes to the polls. For the mere partisan the matter is easy enough: he simply votes the regular ticket. He knows just where to put his cross because he obeys implicitly the dictum of party leaders; and no doubt many people continue to vote as they have been accustomed to simply because it is the easiest thing to do. For the independent voter the task is no light one. As to measures, tendencies, and principles, he can inform himself and inform others; but, when it comes to choosing between the men offered him, he may be compelled to say, "A plague on both your houses!" This may be because he knows too well the character of the men he is asked to vote for. But another difficulty rises because he cannot know them sufficiently well. The man who is voting for aldermen at large in a great city may be able to know something about a candidate in his own ward or neighborhood; but he may be absolutely in the dark as to a candidate who lives on the other side of the city, and what he may pick up about him in the papers may only serve to darken counsel. The need, therefore, in every city of good government clubs, municipal leagues, and citizens' associations, non-partisan in character, which shall seek to secure the nomination of good men, and to furnish just such information as an independent voter needs, is very evident.

It is interesting to see our Universalist brethren so wrought up over the subject of higher criticism. The early Universalists, like the early Unitarians, loaded their guns with Biblical proof-texts; and the Universalists have not yet been delivered from the strained view of Biblical interpretation which marked both sides in that period of controversy. But, unless the conservative Universalists wake up, their Calvinistic brethren, under the lead of Dr. Briggs, will be far ahead of them in a scientific interpretation of the Bible. Not that the Universalists have not good Biblical scholars. Dr. Orello Cone, president of Buchtel College, is one of the leading New Testament scholars in that body; and he has presented the principles of modern criticism with great fairness and ability. But now we find Rev. Jacob Straub, in an article in the Christian Leader, answering Dr. Cone with such logic as this: "With President Cone facts and scientific methods are everything. He should have pointed to the missions at home and abroad which his school of interpretation, now a century old, have established and maintained; how many hospitals, how many churches, colleges, and universities they have built and endowed—not captured, but built—with money from their own pockets?"

It is somewhat late to apologize to Theodore Parker for insults offered to him when he was alive; and it is possible that those who are now praying for Ingersoll are not ready to apologize for the maledictions of an older generation. But Rev. Dr. Buckley of the Christian Advocate does not mean that his own position shall be a matter of doubt. In an editorial four columns in length, entitled "Presumptuous Prayer," he considers in detail the Scriptural and rational grounds for the recent action of three thousand members of the Christian Endeavor Society at Cleveland in deciding to pray exactly at noon on Thanksgiving Day for the conversion of Col. Ingersoll. The Advocate maintains that publicity will not add anything to the strength of prayer, and says, "Superstition fancies that, if there be a concentration at a moment by a large number, something will be done by God that otherwise might not be done." Dr. Buckley admits that the history of all great revivals of modern Christianity, as well as much observation, has convinced him "that where men's names, without their consent and professed penitence, are announced publicly as subjects of prayer, whatever the effect upon other persons of the announcing of them, in the majority of instances the strongest characters have repudiated the proceedings, and have become more determined than ever against God."

REFERRING now to the case of Theodore Parker, he says: "The examples of public prayers for men of this sort are not favorable to such a performance. We were present in 1858 when large evangelical meetings prayed for Theodore Parker, that God might 'put a hook in his mouth,' that he might be led out into the wilderness, and 'removed as a stumbling-block'; and we denounced it then. The effect was reactionary to the last extent upon public sentiment and upon Theodore Parker, who, from his point of view, most justly satirized a revival such as would lead to such prayers as were offered in Boston and elsewhere with respect to himself. Similar prayers were offered for Abner Kneeland, the atheist, who defied God, and for Thomas Paine. We apologize to the memory and friends of Theodore Parker for introducing his name in connection with these men: he was a great and learned, a reverent, and, doubtless, a sincere man, but related to the evangelical movement of the time in such a way as to be spoken of as 'an arch enemy' by those who prayed for his conversion or removal." Dr. Buckley has the courage of his convictions; but we should not be surprised if some of the old-fashioned Methodists shook their heads about his views of prayer, for nothing has been more common among Methodists and Baptists than to seek to influence divine action by securing a great number of petitioners.

MAMBRINO'S HELMET.

When Don Quixote was riding forth in search of adventures, he caught sight of one whom he declared to be "a knight on a dapple-gray steed, with a helmet of gold on his head." "What I see and perceive," answered Sancho, "is only a man on a gray ass like mine, with something on his head that glitters."

When the test was made, and Don Quixote had couched his lance and advanced to meet the unknown wayfarer, he was compelled to admit that, to all outward appearance, Sancho was right. The supposed knight was a barber, and what he had taken for a helmet was evidently only a barber's brass basin. But here the delicious humor of Cervantes comes in. Don Quixote admits the unwelcome fact; but what of it? His explanation is ready and ample: "Knowest thou, Sancho, what I conceive to be the case? This famous piece, this enchanted helmet, by some strange accident must have fallen into the possession of one who, ignorant of its true value as a helmet, and seeing it to be purest gold, hath inconsiderately melted down the one-half for lucre's sake, and of the other half made this which, as thou sayest, doth look indeed like a barber's basin; but to me, who know what it really is, its transformation is of no importance, for I will have it repaired in the first town where there is a smith, so that it shall not be surpassed or even equalled. In the mean time I will wear it as I can; for something is better than nothing, and it will be sufficient to defend me from stones."

This reads like a pleasant satire on the present theological situation. Nothing is more evident than the way in which the advance in knowledge has acted upon ecclesiastical pretensions. Doctrines which have gleamed in the distance as with supernatural light have, upon closer investigation, been proven to be illusions. Events and institutions which have been held to be the miracles of history are shown to belong to the ordinary course of nature.

Now, the singular thing is that a great number of people will admit all this, and yet go on as if nothing had happened. When you tell them that there has been a great transformation in modern thought in regard to the origin of religion and its authority, they readily assent to the statement; but then they add, with Don Quixote, that "the transformation is of no importance." The old dogmas are apparently badly damaged, and the facts seem to be all against them; but, then, they can be patched up, so that they will be as good as new, and perhaps better. Ambitious systems, which in the past were received with implicit faith, as part of a supernatural scheme, are now seen to be susceptible of a naturalistic explanation. Their adherents are quite ready to accept such an explanation. Indeed, when science has compelled them to go with him one mile, they offer of their own accord to go with him twain. And it is so pleasant, as they walk on, to talk of evolution: it throws so much light on the part of the way they have gone over. To be sure, some of the explanations it gives are a trifle too simple; but that is an easy fault to mend. They can readily be elaborated and sophisticated by those skilled in such matters. The scientific method is accepted as an admirable one, but there is not the slightest suspicion that it will lead to anything but the orthodox conclusion.

And, somehow, they do come out at last at a sound orthodox conclusion. As honest Nym would say, "That's the humor of it."

Modern apologetic literature is sorely puzzling to the unskilled reader. The writer starts out boldly, like a man who is going into a far country. He bids a touching farewell to tradition, and declines the help of a special revelation. He appeals only to reason, and is a little sceptical of that. He will put everything to the test. No wonder that one is a little afraid to start off with so bold an adventurer.

In such a case the prudent person looks only at the title-page. If there he sees some safe name,—as, for example, a bishop or a Bampton lecturer,—he dismisses all anxiety, knowing that he will have all the exhilaration of thought without any of its dangers. He may be taken into a far country, but in these personally conducted excursions he is sure to be brought back to exactly the spot he started from. How he got back he will never know; but there he is. Back in the shelter of his inherited creed, his thought is only a little broadened by his consideration of cosmic forces, of eternal laws, of the age-long human struggle, and of spiritual currents that sweep around the world. Toward those who are outside the fold, and who call themselves by another name, his attitude is more kindly; but, still, it is only that downright intolerance has softened into a "certain condescension" toward those whose religious condition is assumed to be inferior to his own.

The churchman who admits freely that the idea of apostolic succession has no historic justification, and that the great creeds were formulated according to the exigencies of ecclesiastical politics, might be supposed to be ready to give up the arrogantly exclusive claims that were first put forth under a misconception as to the facts. Not at all! Now that the facts are out of the way, the claims have room to grow to more astonishing proportions.

Biblical criticism has proven conclusively that there are errors in the Bible, as we now have it. "Certainly," says the theological Don Quixote; "and that makes it all the more necessary that I should seize my lance and ride forth to destroy the wicked heretics who deny the infallibility of the Scriptures,—that is, that the Scriptures were infallible when they were first written." As the part of Mambrino's helmet which was of indisputable genuineness was, according to the knight's convenient theory, the part that was lost, so the sacred manuscripts which were miraculously free from error were long ago buried in oblivion, and no man knoweth their grave unto this day. The fact that they have disappeared and cannot be of the slightest guidance to any living soul does not seem to make the belief in their inerrancy any the less important or precious.

This theory of infallibility, which in some of the great churches of our country is made the test of Orthodoxy, is curiously incapable of any practical application. About all that can be said for it is that "something is better than nothing." It is a helmet, however, that may for the time defend its wearer from stones.

All this has its amusing side, but it has real seriousness, also. The great danger to religion in this age of transition is that of falling into obscurantism. To do so is to lose power, and to become a victim to illusion.

There is an earnest, pathetic cry for truth; and the religious teacher who fulfils his function is the one who with most simplicity and directness seeks to answer the demand. One cannot have all the satisfactions of freedom and all the satisfactions of authority at the same time. He must make his choice, and stick to it. When any idea has been shown to be an illusion, it is sheer Quixotism to go back to it and take it up, because once it had been full of power. Those are foredoomed to failure who put their trust in make-believes and makeshifts. Too much energy already is wasted in the attempt at mere accommodations and temporary expedients.

We need to educate people to think clearly, to speak sincerely, and to act bravely. There will be no danger when this is done but that the religious nature will find enough to sustain it. For the life of real religion is nourished, not by illusions, but by reality.

THE IDEA OF GOD.

We present this week Dr. John Fiske's essay on "The Everlasting Reality of Religion," delivered a few weeks since before the Unitarian Club of Boston. Dr. Fiske follows here a new line of argument, with fresh illustration, but leading to the same grand conclusions as to the everlasting reality of religion uttered in his little books, "The Idea of God" and "The Destiny of Man." This essay is another illustration of the inspiration which may come to the religious sentiment from the doctrine of evolution. "Of all the implications of the doctrine of evolution with regard to man," says Dr. Fiske, "I believe the very deepest and strongest to be that which asserts the everlasting reality of religion."

On the other hand, from the standpoint of speculative philosophy, Prof. Josiah Royce of Harvard University, at the end of an elaborate and subtle paper on "The Conception of God," delivered before the Philosophical Union of the University of California, has recently made the following decided affirmation:—

I myself am one of those students whom a more modern and radical scepticism has, indeed, put in general very much out of sympathy with many of what seem to me the unessential accidents of religious tradition as represented in the historical faith; and for such students this scepticism has transformed, in many ways, our methods of defining our relation to truth. But this scepticism has not thrown even the most radical of us, if we are enlightened, out of a close, a rational, a spiritually intelligent relation to those deep ideas that, despite all these accidents, have moulded the heart of the history of religion. In brief, then, the foregoing conception of God undertakes to be distinctly theistic, and not pantheistic. It is not the conception of any Unconscious Reality, into which finite beings are absorbed; nor of a Universal Substance, in whose law our ethical independence is lost; nor of an Ineffable Mystery, which we can only silently adore. On the contrary, every ethical predicate which the highest religious faith of the past has attributed to God is capable of exact interpretation in terms of our present view. For my own part, then, while I wish to be no slave of any tradition, I am certainly disposed to insist that what the faith of our fathers has genuinely meant by God is, despite all the blindness and all the unessential accidents of religious tradition, identical with the inevitable outcome of a reflective philosophy.

At the same meeting Prof. Joseph Le Conte and Prof. Howison, on different pathways of argument, reached the same practical conclusion. Thus, by differing methods, leaders of thought and science and philosophy are reaffirming the fundamental faith of the soul.

WOMEN AS OVERSEERS OF THE POOR.

The traits in women which have been developed by long generations of experience are beginning to be appreciated by the body politic, and their aid asked for the public good. There is not a State in the Union which would not be better for the help of women in the care of the poor; but comparatively few States have found this out, and even in the States where in certain cities women have been appointed overseers of the poor the other cities and towns lag behind. In the year 1877 the town of Brookline, Mass., and in 1891 Boston and Winchester, made this attempt; and in all these places the presence of women has been most beneficial.

This work may be considered rather disagreeable and unattractive, and the question may rise why women are specially fitted for it. It is true that whoever undertakes it must be thrown more or less into association with uncongenial and unkempt members of society. The paupers of a commonwealth are naturally hopeless and almost helpless; and it takes a strong spirit and a willing heart to minister properly to their needs. One reason, perhaps, why women are well adapted for this work is the fact that they are by nature self-sacrificing and usually buoyant in temperament. But other reasons may be assigned. A committee known as the "Committee on Women as Overseers of the Poor" has been formed in Massachusetts, with its headquarters in Boston, 12 Marlboro Street, made up of men and women deeply interested in caring for all the suffering classes.

This committee has issued a circular giving several reasons why women are eminently fitted to take their places among the officers for poor relief. Among these reasons are the following:—

Because the time necessary for this important work is more often at their disposal.

Because the classes to be aided are largely composed of women and children.

Because of their special fitness to advise with the matrons of almshouses about the domestic arrangements of these institutions.

Because of their fitness to discharge the duty now devolving upon boards of overseers of the poor, of towns as well as of cities, of finding suitable homes outside the almshouse for dependent children.

This circular is signed by such persons as George S. Hale, president of the Boston Children's Aid Society; Robert Treat Paine, president of the Associated Charities of Boston; Mrs. Anne B. Richardson; Elizabeth C. Putnam; Elizabeth G. Evans; Charles P. Worcester, M.D.; Frank B. Fay, general agent of the Massachusetts Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children; Rev. Frederick B. Allen; William P. Fowler, chairman of the overseers of the poor, Boston; Horace James, chairman of the overseers of the poor of Brookline; Joseph Lee; James H. Lewis, agent of the overseers of the poor of Springfield; Clara T. Leonard, Springfield; Rev. Charles Gordon Ames; and Gen. Francis A. Walker.

Now, the fact that a woman is a woman is in itself no reason why she should be appointed to do this work. Nor, if it could be proved that twenty selected women would do the work as well as twenty selected men in any town, would the town be justified in making up its board of overseers wholly from the women of the place. A mixed board is far better, that the masculine influence shall be felt as well as the feminine. There should be a union of the two in proper proportion. The women should be selected not alone because they have a generous desire to do good. That should lead; but it should be so tempered by wisdom that there will be no danger of the heart running away with the head. There are kindly women who are prudent, but are not observant. The truly valuable woman in such a place should have eyes that are trained to see, a brain that can weigh evidence, and a tongue that can speak at the proper time, and at no other. These, combined with the warm heart and willing purpose, make a person, whether man or woman, fit for the work, if physical health accompanies such desirable graces.

But, in addition to natural qualifications, there should be some sort of training to fit either men or women for this work. A certain amount of reading should precede the attempt to care scientifically and humanely for the poor of the State. A knowledge of the best methods of charity organization societies should also be a part of the mental equipment, and of simple industries, that, wherever possible, occupation should be found for every inmate of a poorhouse who is able to use hands or feet. When our almshouse population is properly classified, and the really invalid class is kept by itself, it will be found that many more inmates are capable of employment than often appears when the idle and the invalid are massed together, and all are alike left in idleness.

In Ohio every county has its board of visitors, one-half of whom are women; and the excellence of their work in improving the condition of the poor is everywhere acknowledged. Were that influence extended judiciously to every township and city, the effect would be an untold blessing.

Musings.

THERE is a new book of Numbers, and I confess that I am much more interested in it than in the one in the Pentateuch. I have never cared much for numbers in the abstract. I was much more fond of algebra than arithmetic when a boy. Perhaps the letters made it seem a little more literary; and by and by the literary interest dominated the arithmetical, and I dropped figures altogether. Numbers meant much more to me when they had some concrete association; and I remember that, in learning the multiplication table, the horses on a New York "Dry Dock" omnibus going down Columbia Street hill, so called, clattered out with their hoofs, "Seven times seven are forty-nine; seven times eight are fifty-six." These numbers were thus literally inculcated, stamped in with the heel,—or ungulated, if you prefer; though neither the horses nor the driver had any idea of the part they played in my education. There were other numbers, too, that had a concrete significance. There was "Big 6" and "41" and "44" and "33," otherwise known as "Black joke," and "17" and "31," and a few other numbers that loomed up into great importance, so far as certain boys were concerned, in the old New York Fire Department. It cost New York a good deal to pay for the career of "Big 6," whose foreman was William M. Tweed; but the number still has a fascination for me in spite of the smell of fire and the burnt reputations with which it is connected.

I NEVER expected to have so much interest in figures again. But the new book of numbers I find to be authoritative and useful, not for its historic value, but for putting me into right relations to the present. The new book of numbers is a product of Genesis and Revelation,—the genesis of power and the revelation of science. There were voices that spoke in the old book of Numbers, and there are voices that speak through the new. Sometimes they speak with authority, with knowledge, with tenderness and persuasiveness. In prison every man has his number. He may be 5,253 or 3,525. But I find that people outside of prison are coming now to have a great numerical interest for me. It may be that these numerical designations will become so strongly fixed in the community that by and by it will be customary to introduce people by their numbers rather than by their names. This will be of great advantage in the case of women, one of whom, to my certain knowledge, had four different "last names" in the course of her life.

THE modern book of numbers is the telephone book. In his day David was forbidden to number the people. But the telephone managers have not been obstructed in this way, and they have numbered everybody to their liking. They see that it is taken for granted that people are attached to their personality. Family relations have been created by the danish habit of naming babies; and it is in the future such family jaunts avoided by simply numbering entry into the world. My friend, the vicar in Greece, who has twenty-four children, would have been saved a good deal of name-hunting by the device. I wonder what percentage of the telephone companies in the United States or combinations. Certainly, the number of age; for one of my dear lady friends, who is only in her ninetieth year, they have numbered 101. I certainly hope that she will live as long, not so much for her own sake as for the sake of her friends who enjoy her ripened age. Though the telephone numbers do not seem to confer significance, I find that they are gradually absorbing significance from the personalities with whom they are connected. Thus 45-2, instead of being merely an abstract expression of quantity, represents a sweet, refined, and charming personality. 508 is the arithmetic of radical, uncompromising independence, sterling integrity, and conscientious adhesion to conviction. It is the symbol of the reformer.

I would affix to Luther if I could him in a telephone book. 906 has a slight ecclesiastical flavor; but it is humane, sympathetic, earnest, and artistic. 10-3 is physically and mentally broad, generous, genial, jovial, somewhat agricultural rather typographical, but none the less religious, and just to a fault. Then there is 664, very dangerously near 666, the number of the beast in Revelation; and I suppose the A. P. A.'s would say it ought to be the telephone number of the pope of Rome, forgetting that 666 is Arabic, and not Roman. I am glad my friend escapes by a safe margin this reproach. He is a splendid man, whether at home or abroad. If he does not write some more letters from Hungary, I shall "call him up"; and, if his wife or baby answers the telephone, all the better.

Brevities.

Col. Ingersoll was probably more diverted than converted by the concerted Cleveland prayers on his behalf.

The North-western Christian Advocate thinks this is an era of hymn-book making. It might find some support for the statement in the Unitarian denomination which, we suspect, has gotten up more hymn-books in proportion to its size than any other denomination.

Robert Collyer's recent visit to Boston, where he preached to a great audience in Unity Church, gave many of his friends a chance to see his "solar face." He beamed in the Register office, and pronounced his apostolic benediction. His birthday was last Sunday.

Three thousand extra copies of the two Conference papers of the Christian Register were printed; but so great was the call for them that the demand exceeded the supply by several hundred. If, therefore, any of our readers have copies of the issues of October 31 and November 7 which they may wish to have sent on missionary tours we shall be glad to receive them at this office.

Whatever may be the outcome of football, the college crews, with a more rational form of amusement, have furnished some stalwart men. Hon. N. M. Brigham, who made the address at the installation service of Rev. A. L. Hudson in Salt Lake City, was the stroke oar of the winning crews at Harvard of 1877, 1878, and 1879; and Mr. Brigham, as president, seems to be the stroke oar of the Unitarian church, and will no doubt help to pull it to a similar success.

The North-western Christian Advocate "has two photographs of the terrible scene of the deadly burning of a live Negro in Texas, and those who know the crowd surrounding the awful stake can recognize the faces of a few members of Southern churches." This is not the first time that church members have roasted their fellow-beings alive; and it is quite possible that, with self-righteous complacency, they contributed on the following Sunday to the cause of foreign missions.

There is the Christian Advocate (Methodist) coming to the defence of Thomas Paine to the extent of defending him against the SPIRIT of atheism: "A despatch from New Rochelle, N. Y., speaks of an old homestead on the road to White Plains, which was SCENED, as having been 'frequently visited HERE' by the atheist, Thomas Paine." Thomas PLEA, in 'The Age of Reason,' explicitly denied being an atheist, and affirmed that he believed in one God. If he ever avowed himself an atheist, or hesitated to declare that he believed in one God, we should like some reader who is in possession of the original to communicate with us."

This week Rev. John W. Chadwick of Brooklyn will write his one thousandth sermon, and will complete next Sunday the thirty-first year of his pastorate in Brooklyn. It was said of Increase Mather that he never preached a sermon but was worthy to be printed. Taking form and substance and spirit, we do not believe that there is another preacher of whose thousand sermons this could be more truly said than of Mr. Chadwick; and, as a matter of fact, many of them have met this well-deserved fate, and some have been translated into other tongues. In the full maturity of his power, Mr. Chadwick's one thousandth will be not least, of the series. We from the have an esteemed contributor of the from the same present at the service next Sunday. We wonder how many articles and how many thousand book reviews he has written for these columns.

Pro and Con.

AN INADVERTENCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:

By an inadvertence, a marginal note explicitly naming the book of Mr. Savage which was referred to by me in your latest issue was omitted. Kindly permit me to state, therefore, that it was entitled "Belief in God." The edition which I have was published by Mr. Ellis in 1888. I trust I may be able to revive an interest in it.

HENRY HOWARD.

Providence, R. I., December 9.

NATURAL RELIGION.

Up through the mystic deeps of sunny air
I cried to God, "O Father, art thou there?"
Sudden the answer, like a flute, I heard:
It was an angel, though it seemed a bird.
—Richard Le Gallienne.

THE EVERLASTING REALITY OF RELIGION.*

BY JOHN FISKE, LL.D.

The visitor to Geneva, whose studies have made him familiar with the richest human personality of all that are associated with that historic city, will never leave the place without making a pilgrimage to Ferney. In that refined and quiet rural homestead things still remain very much as on the day when the aged Voltaire left it for that last visit to Paris, where his long life was worthily ended, amid words and deeds of affectionate homage. One may sit down at the table where was written the most perfect prose, perhaps, that ever flowed from pen, and look about the little room, with its evidences of plain living and high thinking, until one seems to recall the eccentric figure of the vanished master, with his flashes of shrewd wisdom and caustic wit, his insatiable thirst for knowledge, his consuming hatred of bigotry and oppression, his merciless contempt for shams, his boundless enthusiasm of humanity. As we stroll in the park, that quaint presence goes along with us, till all at once, in a shady nook, we come upon something highly significant and characteristic,—the little parish church, with its inscription over the portal, "Deo erexit Voltaire." And, as we muse upon it, the piercing eyes and sardonic but not unkindly smile seem still to follow us. What meant this eccentric inscription?

When Voltaire became the possessor of the manor of Ferney, the church was sadly out of repair, and stood where it obstructed the view from certain windows of the chateau. So he had it cleared away, and built in a better spot the new church which is still there. It was duly consecrated, and the pope further hallowed it with some relics of ancient saints; and there, for many a year, the tenants and dependants of the manor assembled for divine service. Nowhere in France had Voltaire ever seen a church dedicated to God. It was always to Our Lady of This or Saint So-and-so of That: always there was some intermediary between the devout soul and the God that is worshipped. Not thus should it be with Voltaire's church, built upon his own estate to minister to the spiritual needs of his people. It should be dedicated simply to the worship and service of God. Furthermore, it was built and dedicated, not by any ecclesiastical or corporate body, but by the lord of the manor, the individual layman, Voltaire.

This, I say, was highly characteristic: it gave terse and pointed expression to Voltaire's way of looking at such things. Church and theology were ignored, and the individual soul was left alone with its God. The Protestant reformers and other free thinkers had stopped far short of this. In place of an infallible Church, they had left an infallible book; if they rejected transubstantiation, they retained as obligatory such doctrines as those of the incarnation and atonement; if they laughed at the miracles of mediæval saints, they would allow no discredit to be thrown upon those of the apostolic age. In short, they left standing a large part, if not the larger part, of the supernatural edifice within which the religious mind of Europe had so long been sheltered. But Voltaire regarded that whole supernatural edifice as so much rubbish, impeding the full development of the human mind, and which ought as quickly as possible to be torn to pieces and cleared away. His emotions, as well as his reason, were concerned in this conclusion. Organized Christianity, as it then existed in France, was responsible for much atrocious injustice; and in neighboring lands the Inquisition still existed. Ecclesiastical bigotry, the prejudices of ignorance, whatever tended to hold people in darkness and restrain them from the full and natural use of their faculties, Voltaire hated with all the intensity of which he was capable. He summed it all up in one abstract term, and personified it as "the Infamous"; and the watchword of that life of tireless vigilance was, "Crush the infamous." Supernatural theology had been too often pressed into the service of "the infamous," and for supernatural theology the lord of Ferney could find no place in his scheme of things. He lost no chance of assailing it with mockery and sarcasm made terrible by earnestness of purpose, till he came to be regarded as the most inveterate antagonist of the Church.

* An Essay delivered before the Boston Unitarian Club.

Yet, among the great men of letters in France contemporary with Voltaire, the most part went further than he, and denied the reality of religion. Few of them, indeed, believed in the existence of God, or would have had anything to do with building a house of worship. It is related of David Hume that, when dining once in a party of eighteen at the house of Baron d'Holbach, he expressed a doubt as to whether any person would anywhere be found willing to avow himself dogmatically an atheist. "Indeed, my dear sir," said the host, "you are at this moment sitting at table with seventeen such persons!" In that group of philosophers were men of great intelligence and lofty purpose, such as D'Alembert, Diderot, Helvetius, Condorcet, Buffon,—men with more real Christianity in their natures than you could find in half the churches of Christendom. The roots of their atheism were emotional rather than philosophical. It was part of the generous but rash and superficial impulse through which they had disowned all connection with a church that had become subservient to so much that was bad. Their atheism was one of the fruits of the policy which had suppressed Huguenotism in France. It was an early instance of what has since been often observed, that materialism and atheism are more apt to flourish in Romanist than in Protestant countries. A form of religion which is already to some extent purified and rationalized awakens no such violent revulsion in free-thinking minds as have those more heavily encumbered with remnants of primitive thought. Moreover, the rationalized religion of Protestant countries is very commonly found in alliance with political freedom. In France, under the Old Régime, the Catholic religion was stigmatized as an ally of despotism, as well as a congeries of absurd doctrines and ceremonies. The best minds felt their moral sense shocked by it no less than their reason. No very deep thinking was done on the subject. The phase which religious sentiment had assumed in the Middle Ages had become unintelligible. The most highly endowed minds were dead to the sublimity of Gothic architecture, and could see nothing but grotesque folly in Dante's poetry. They seriously believed that religious doctrines and ecclesiastical government were originally elaborate systems of fraud, devised by crafty tyrants for the sole purpose of enslaving the multitude of mankind. No discrimination was shown: they were as ready to throw away belief in God as in the miracles of Saint Columbanus, and to scout the notion of a future life in the same terms in which they denounced the forged donation of Constantine. The flippant ease with which they disposed of the gravest questions, in ignorance of the very nature of the problem to be solved, was well illustrated in that remark of the astronomer, Lalande, that he had swept the heavens with his telescope and found no God there. A similar instance of missing the point was furnished about fifty years ago by the eminent physiologist, Moleschott, when he exclaimed, "No thought without phosphorus!" and congratulated himself that he had forever disposed of the human soul. Perhaps those are the two silliest remarks that ever appeared in print. A very different spirit was shown in the reply of Laplace, when reminded by Napoleon that his great treatise on the dynamics of the solar system contained no allusion to God,—"I had no need of that hypothesis." This remark was profound; for it meant that, in order to give a specific explanation of any single group of phenomena, it would not do to appeal to divine action, which is equally the source of all phenomena. Science can deal with secondary causes only.

In the eighteenth century men of science were learning that such is the case, and they believed that the logical result was atheism. This was because the only idea of God which they had ever been taught to entertain was the Latin idea of a God remote from the world, and manifested only through occasional interference with the order of nature. When they dismissed this idea, they deemed themselves atheists. If they had been familiar with the Greek idea of God as immanent in the world, and manifested at every moment through the orderly sequence of its phenomena, their conclusion would probably have been different.

To these philosophers Voltaire's unshaken theism seemed a mere bit of eccentric conservatism. But Voltaire saw a rational principle at work which atheism could in no wise account for. To him the universe seemed full of evidences of beneficent purpose; and more than once he set forth, with eloquence and power, the "argument from design" which received its fullest development at the hands of Paley and the authors of the "Bridgewater Treatise." There is, thus, yet another significance added to the little church at Ferney: not only was it the sole church in France dedicated to God, not only was its builder a layman, hostile to ecclesiastical doctrines and methods, but he was almost alone among the eminent free thinkers of his age and country in believing in God and asserting the everlasting reality of religion.

In the English-speaking world there has never been any such divorce between rationalism and religion as in France; and among the glories of English literature are such deeply reverent and profoundly philosophical writings as those of Hooker and Chillingworth, Butler and Paley, and, in our own time, of Dr. Martineau. Nowhere in history, perhaps, have faith and reason been more harmoniously wedded together than in the history of English Protestantism. But the disturbance that affected France in the age of Voltaire now affects the whole Christian world, and every question connected with religion has been probed to depths of which the existence was scarcely suspected a century ago. One seldom, indeed, hears the mockery in which the old French writers dealt so freely. That was an ebullition of temper called forth by a tyranny that had come to be a social nuisance. The scepticism of our day is rather sad than frivolous: it drags people from long-cherished notions in spite of themselves; it spares but few that are active-minded; it invades the church, and does not stop in the pews to listen, but ascends the pulpit and preaches. There is no refuge anywhere from this doubting, testing spirit of the age.

In the attitude of civilized men toward the world in which we live, the change of front has been stupendous. The old cosmology has been overthrown in huddling ruin. Attacks upon old doctrines multiply; and rituals, creeds, and Scriptures are overhauled and criticised until a young generation grows up, knowing nothing of the sturdy faith of its grandfathers save by hearsay, for it sees everything in heaven and earth called upon to show its credentials.

The general effect of this intellectual movement has been to discredit more than ever the Latin idea of God as a power outside of the course of nature, occasionally interfering with it. In all directions the process of evolution has been discovered, working after similar methods; and this forces upon us the belief in the unity of nature. We are thus driven to the Greek conception of God as the Power working in and through nature, without interference or infraction of law. The element of chance, which some atheists formerly admitted into their scheme of things, nobody would now waste his time in theorizing about,—a fortuitous concourse of atoms. We have so far spelled out the history of creation as to see that all has been done in strict accordance with law. The method has been the method of evolution; and, the more we study it, the more do we find that one part of the story never gives the lie to another part.

So beautiful is all this orderly progression, so satisfying to some of our intellectual needs, that many minds are inclined to doubt if anything more can be said of the universe than that it is a reign of law, an endless aggregate of coexistences and sequences. When I say that one star attracts another star, we do not really know that there is any pulling in the case. All we know is that a piece of cosmical matter, in the presence of another piece of matter, alters its space-relations in a certain specified way. Among the coexistences and sequences there is an order which we can detect, and a few thinkers are inclined to maintain that this is the whole story.

Such a state of mind, which rests satisfied with a mere body of observed facts, without seeking to trace their ultimate implications, is a characteristic of what Auguste Comte called Positivism. It is a more refined phase of atheism than that of the guests at Baron d'Holbach's; but its adherents are not many, for the impetus of modern scientific thought tends, with overpowering force, to the conception of a single first cause, or prime mover, perpetually manifested from moment to moment in all the universe. As I have elsewhere argued [in "The Idea of God"], this is practically identical with the Athanasian conception of the immanent Deity. Modern men of science have called this view of things Monism; but, when questioned concerning the immanent First Cause, they reply with a general disclaimer of knowledge, and thus entitle themselves to be called by Huxley's term, Agnostics.

Just here comes along the materialist, and asks some questions, and tries to serve on us a kind of writ of quo warranto. If modern physics leads inevitably to the conception of a single infinite power manifested in all phenomena of the knowable universe, by what authority do we identify that power with the indwelling Deity as conceived by Saint Athanasius? The Athanasian Deity is, to some extent, fashioned in man's image: he is, to say the least, like the psychical part of ourselves. After making all possible allowance for the gulf which separates that which is infinite and absolute from that which is finite and relative, an essential kinship is asserted between God and the human soul. "By what authority," our materialist will ask, "do we assert any such kinship between the human soul and the power which modern physics reveals as active throughout the universe? Is not it going far beyond our knowledge to assert any such kinship? Would it not be more modest and becoming in us simply to designate this ever-active, universal power by some purely scientific term?" This argument is to-day a very familiar one, and it wears a plausible aspect. It is couched in a spirit of scientific reserve, which wins for it respectful consideration. The modest and cautious spirit of science has done so much for us that it is always wise to give due heed to its warnings. "Let us beware of going beyond our knowledge," says the materialist. "We know nothing but phenomena as manifestations of an indwelling force, nor have we any ground for supposing there is anything psychical in the universe outside of the individual minds of men and other animals. Moreover," he continues, "the psychical phenomena of which we are conscious—memory, emotion, volition—are but peculiarly continued manifestations of the same indwelling force which, under other conditions, appears as light or heat or electricity. All such manifestations are fleeting; and beyond this world of fleeting phenomena we have no warrant, whether in consciousness or common sense, for supposing that anything psychical exists. This world, cognizable through sense, is all there is; and the story of it that we can decipher by the aid of terrestrial experience is the whole story. The unseen world is a mere figment of the fancy of primeval man." Such is the general view of things that the materialist urges upon us, with the plea of scientific sobriety and caution; and to many minds it wears a plausible aspect.

Nevertheless, when subjected to criticism, it soon loses this appearance, and is seen to be rash and hasty. In the first place, I have argued that there is no such correlation as is alleged between physical forces and the phenomena of consciousness. I have put that argument into print so many times that I will not stop to repeat it here, but simply mention the point, and go on to the second place. When we come to the denial of all kinship between the human soul and the infinite Power which is revealed in all phenomena, we shall find the materialistic theory raises difficulties quite as great as those which it seeks to avoid. The difficulties which it wishes to avoid are those which evidently encumber the attempt to conceive of Deity as personality exerting volition and cherishing intelligent purposes. Such difficulties are undeniably great: nay, we may as well confess at once that they are insuperable. Words which have gained their meaning from finite experience must inevitably falter and fail when we seek to apply them to that which is infinite. But we do not mend matters by employing terms taken from the inorganic world rather than from human personality. To designate the universal Power by some scientific term, such as Force, does not help us in the least. All our experience of force is an experience of finite forces antagonized by other forces: we can frame no conception whatever of infinite force, comprising within itself all the myriad antagonizing attractions and impulses of which the universe consists. We go beyond our knowledge when we speak of infinite force quite as much as when we speak of infinite personality. Indeed, no word or phrase which we seek to apply to Deity can be other than an extremely unsatisfactory symbol. From the very nature of the case, it must always be so; and, if we once understand the reason why, it need not vex nor puzzle us. It is not only when we try to speculate about Deity that we find ourselves encompassed with difficulties, and are made to realize how very short is our mental tether. This world, in its commonest aspects, presents many baffling problems of which it is sometimes wholesome that we should be reminded. [Here followed some examples of the difficulties of conception involved in sundry physical problems connected with the compressibility of matter, and with the luminiferous ether.] Such difficulties are not confined to theological subjects: they confront us upon the occasion of every fresh extension of our knowledge of the physical world. What must we expect when we come to speculate upon the nature and the modes of existence of God? Bearing this in mind, let us proceed to consider the assumption that the Infinite Power manifested in the universe is psychical in its nature,—in other words, that between God and the human soul there is kinship, though we may be unable to render any theoretical account of it.

Let us consider this assumption historically and in the light of our general knowledge of evolution. Let us look at it after the manner of naturalists. It is with purpose that I use the word "assumption." As a matter of history, the existence of a quasi-human God has always been an assumption, a postulate, something which men have all along taken for granted. It probably never occurred to any one to try to prove the existence of such a God until it was doubted, and doubts on that subject are very modern. Omitting from the count a few score ingenious philosophers, it may be said that all mankind—the wisest and the simplest—have taken for granted the existence of a Deity, or deities, of a psychical nature more or less similar to that of humanity. Such a postulate has formed a part of our human thinking from the primeval ages down to the present time. The forms in which it has appeared have been myriad in number, but all have been included in this same fundamental assumption.

Take away from our symbolic conception of God the human element, and that aspect of theism which has from the outset chiefly interested mankind has gone. That supremely interesting aspect of theism is part and parcel of the general belief in an unseen world in which human beings have an interest. The belief in the personal continuance of the human soul after death is a very ancient one. The savage custom of burying utensils and trinkets for the use of the deceased enables us to trace it back into the glacial period. We may safely say that for more than a hundred thousand years mankind have regarded themselves as personally interested in two worlds,—the physical world and another world, comparatively dim and vaguely outlined, with which the psychical side of humanity is more closely connected. This belief in the unseen world seems to be coextensive with theism. The animism of the lowest savage includes both. No race of men has ever been found destitute of the belief in a ghost world. Now, a ghost world implies a personal continuance of human beings after death. These ideas are extremely crude in their symbolism, and the refinement in the conception of Deity is paralleled by the refinement in the conception of the other world. From Walhalla to Dante's Paradise what a distance the human mind had travelled!

In our modern monotheism the assumption of kinship between God and the human soul is the assumption that there is in man a psychical element, identical in nature with that which is eternal. Belief in a quasi-human God and belief in the soul's immortality,—these appear in their origin and development to be inseparably connected. They are part and parcel of one and the same efflorescence of the human mind.

Our account of the rise and progress of the general belief in an unseen world is, however, not yet complete. No mention has been made of an element which apparently has always been present in the belief. I mean the ethical element. The savage's primeval ghost world is always mixed up with his notions of what he ought to do and ought not to do. The native of Terra del Fuego, who foreboded a snow-storm because one of Mr. Darwin's party killed some birds for specimens, gives an excellent illustration. In a tribe living on the verge of starvation, any wanton sacrifice of meat must awaken the wrath of the deities who control the weather. Thus whatever conduct the necessity of clan or tribe have prohibited soon comes to wear the aspect of sacrilege.

Thus inextricably intertwined, from the moment of their first dim dawning upon the consciousness of humanity, have been the notion of Deity, the notion of an unseen world, and the notions of right and wrong. In their beginnings theology and ethics are inseparable: in all historical development of religion they have remained inseparable. The conceptions of primeval man have given place to conceptions framed after wider and deeper experience; but the union of ethics with theology remains undisturbed, even in that most refined religious philosophy which ventures no opinion concerning the happiness or misery of a future human life, except that the seed sown here will naturally determine the fruit to be gathered.

We are now prepared to see what is involved in the reality of religion. Speaking historically, it may be said that religion has always had two sides. On the one side, it has consisted of a theory, more or less elaborate; and, on the other side, it has consisted of a group of sentiments conformable to the theory. Now, in all ages and in every form of religion the theory has comprised three essential elements: first, the belief in Deity as quasi-human; second, belief in an unseen world in which human beings continue to exist after death; third, recognition of the ethical aspects of human life as related in a special and intimate sense to this unseen world. These three elements, I should say, are alike indispensable. If any one of the three be taken away, the remnant cannot properly be called a religion. Is, then, the subject-matter of religion something real and substantial, or is it a mere figment of the imagination? Has religion, through all these centuries, been dealing with an eternal verity, or has it been blindly groping after a phantom? Can that history of the universe which we call the doctrine of evolution be made to furnish any lesson that will prove helpful in answering this question?

We shall find, I think, that it does furnish such a lesson. First, let us remember that, along with the three indispensable elements here specified, every historical religion has always contained a quantity of cosmological speculation, metaphysical doctrine, priestly rites and ceremonies and injunctions; and a very considerable part of this construction has been abolished by criticism. The destruction of beliefs has been so great that we can hardly think it strange if some critics have taken it into their heads that nothing can be rescued. But let us see what the doctrine of evolution has to say. Our inquiry will for a few moments seem to take us far afield, but that we need not mind if we find the answer directing us homeward.

One of the richest contributions made to scientific knowledge in our day is Herbert Spencer's luminous exposition of life as "the continuous adjustment of inner relations to outer relations." The extreme simplicity of the subject in its earliest illustrations is such that the student hardly suspects the wealth of knowledge of various sorts to which it is opening the way. The most fundamental characteristic of living things is their response to external stimuli. If you come upon a dog lying by the roadside, and are in doubt whether he is alive, you poke him with a stick. If you get no response, you presently think that it is a dead dog. So, if a tree fails to put forth leaves, it is an indication of death. Pour water on a drooping plant, and it shows its life by rearing its head: this is a result of a continuous adjustment of relations within the plant to relations existing outside of it. All life upon the globe, whether psychical or physical, represents continued adjustment of inner to outer relations: the degree of life is low or high, according as the correspondence between internal and external relations is simple or complex, perfect or imperfect. The whole progression of life upon the globe, in so far as it has been achieved through natural selection, has consisted in the preservation and propagation of those living creatures in whom the adjustment of inner relations to outer relations is most successful. This is only a more descriptive way of saying that natural selection is equivalent to survival of the fittest.

The shapes of animals, as well as their capacities, have been evolved through almost infinitely slow increments of adjustment upon adjustment. In this way, for instance, has been evolved the vertebrate skeleton, through a process of which Spencer's analysis is as thrilling as a poem. Or consider the development of the special organs of sense: among the most startling disclosures of modern embryology are those which belong to this subject. The most perfect organs of touch are the vibrissæ, or whiskers, of the cat. These are merely specialized forms of such hairs as those which cover the bodies of most mammals, and which remain, in evanescent shape, upon the human skin, imbedded in minute sacs. Now, in their origin, the eye and ear are, like these, sundry specialized, differentiated hairs. The implication of these facts is that sight and hearing were slowly differentiated from the sense of touch. We seem to discern from it how, in the history of the eye, there was at first a sensitive pigment, making one spot particularly sensitive to light. Then came, by slow degrees, the increased translucence, the convexity of surface, and the multiplication of vesicles arranging themselves as retinal rods. And what was the result of all this for the creature in whom organs of vision were thus developed? There was an immense extension of the range, complexity, and definiteness of the adjustment of inner relations to outer relations. In other words, there was an immense increase of life. There came into existence new marvels for those with eyes to see,—a mighty visible world that for sightless creatures had been virtually non-existent. With the further progress of organic life the high development of the senses was attended or followed by the increase of brain development and the correlative intelligence, immeasurably enlarging the scope of the correspondence between the living creature and the outer world.

In the case of man the adjustments by which we meet the exigencies of life from day to day are largely psychical. Our actions are guided by our theory of the situation; and it needs no illustration to show us that a true theory is an adjustment of one's ideas to the external facts, and that such adjustments are helps to successful living. The whole work of education is directed toward cultivating the capacity of framing associations of ideas that conform to objective facts. It is thus that life is guided.

So, as we look back over the marvellous life-history of our planet, even from the time when there was no life more exalted than that of conferva scum on the surface of a pool, through ages innumerable until the present time, when man is beginning to learn how to decipher nature's secrets,—we look back over an infinitely slow series of minute adjustments, gradually and laboriously increasing the points of contact between the inner life and the world environing it. Step by step in the upward advance toward humanity the environment has enlarged, from the world of the fresh water alga, with its tiny field and its brief term of existence, to the world of civilized men, which comprehends the stellar universe during æons of time. Every such enlargement has had reference to actual existences outside. The eye was developed in response to the outward existence of radiant light, the ear in response to the outward existence of acoustic vibrations. The mother's love came in response to the infant's needs. Fidelity and honor were gradually developed as the nascent social life required them. Everywhere the internal adjustment has been brought about so as to harmonize with some actually existing external fact. Such has been nature's method: such is the deepest law of all life that science has been able to detect.

Now there was a critical moment in the history of our planet, when love was beginning to play a part hitherto unknown, when the notions of right and wrong were germinating in the nascent human soul, when the family was coming into existence, when social ties were beginning to be knit, when winged words first took their flight through the air. This is the moment when the process of evolution was being shifted to a higher plane, when civilization was to be superadded to organic evolution, when the last and highest of creatures was coming upon the scene, when the dramatic purpose of creation was approaching fulfillment. At that critical moment we see the nascent human soul vaguely reaching forth toward something akin to itself, not in the realm of fleeting phenomena, but in the eternal presence beyond. An internal adjustment of ideas was achieved in correspondence with an unseen world. That the ideas were very crude and childlike, that they were put together with all manner of grotesqueness, is what might be expected. The cardinal fact is that the crude, child-like mind was groping to put itself into relation with an ethical world not visible to the senses. And one aspect of this fact not to be lightly passed over is the fact that religion, thus set upon the scene coeval with the birth of humanity, has played such a dominant part in the subsequent evolution of human society that what history would be without it is quite beyond our imagination. As to the dimensions of this cardinal fact, there can thus be no question. None can deny that it is the largest and most ubiquitous fact connected with the existence of mankind upon the earth.

Now, if the relation thus established, in the morning twilight of man's career, between the human soul and the world invisible and immaterial is a relation of which only the subjective term is real and the objective term is non-existent, then I say it is something utterly without precedent in the whole history of creation. All the analogies of evolution, so far as men have been able to decipher it, are overwhelmingly against any such supposition. All the analogies of nature fairly shout against the assumption of such a breach of continuity between the evolution of man and all previous evolution. So far as our knowledge of nature goes, the whole momentum of it carries us forward to the conclusion that the unseen world, as the objective term in a relation that has coexisted with the whole career of mankind, has a real existence; and it is but following out the analogy to regard that unseen world as the theatre where the ethical process is destined to reach its full consummation.

The lesson of evolution is that through all these weary ages the human soul has not been cherishing in religion a delusive phantom; but, in spite of seemingly endless groping and stumbling, it has been rising to the recognition of its essential kinship with the ever-living God. Of all the implications of the doctrine of evolution with regard to man, I believe the very deepest and strongest to be that which asserts the everlasting reality of religion.

So far as I am aware, the foregoing argument is here advanced for the first time. It does not pretend to meet the requirements of scientific demonstration: one must not look for scientific demonstration in problems that contain so many factors transcending our direct experience. But, as an appeal to our common sense, the argument here brought forward surely has great weight. It seems to me far more convincing than any chain of subtle metaphysical reasoning can ever be; for such chains, however invincible in appearance, are no stronger than the weakest of their links, and in metaphysics one is always suspecting some undetected flaw. My argument represents the impression irresistibly forced upon one by a pretty broad general familiarity with nature's processes and methods. It therefore belongs to the class of arguments that survive.

Observe, it is far from being a trite repetition of the old argument that beliefs universally accepted must be true. Upon the view here presented, every specific opinion ever entertained by men regarding religion is exceedingly crude; yet the everlasting reality of religion, in its three indispensable elements, as here set forth, remains unassailable. Our common-sense argument puts the scientific presumption entirely and decisively on the side of religion, and against all atheistic and materialistic explanations of the universe. It establishes harmony between our highest knowledge and our highest aspirations by showing that the latter, no less than the former, are a normal result of the universal cosmic process. It has nothing to fear from the advance of scientific discovery; for, as these things come to be better understood, it is going to be realized, I think, that the days of the antagonism between science and religion must by and by come to an end. That antagonism has been chiefly due to the fact that religious ideas were until lately allied with the doctrine of special creation. They have therefore needed to be remodelled and reconsidered from new points of view. But we have at length reached a point where it is becoming daily more and more apparent that, with deeper study of nature, the old strife between faith and knowledge is drawing to a close; and thus, disentangled at last from that ancient slough of despond, the human mind will breathe a freer air and enjoy a vastly extended horizon.

RUSSIA AS IT IS.

BY SOPHIE FRIEDLAND.

There are few countries in the world of which so little is known and of which so many false reports are spread as of the empire of the czar. Russia includes all climates excepting the tropical. Russia is not a state: it is a world by itself. Inhabited by numerous tribes of people, differing in language, manners, customs, and religion, it is certainly a country worth a visit, and more: it is worth studying.

The traveller, as soon as he has crossed the Russian border, finds that he is in another world; for Russian customs differ greatly from those of other countries. They unfortunately prove that, with all our progress in science, art, and literature, our people are still in an undeveloped state of existence. Of course there are many reasons for this; but the predominating cause is to be found in the rules of the Greek-Catholic Church, and the fanaticism with which these rules are executed. There are no less than twenty great church holidays besides Easter and Christmas, and a number of state holidays, like the czar's, czarina's, and czarowitz's birthdays and namesdays, besides coronation and burial days, and a number of saints' days; and on all these days the Russian Church bids its adherents not to work, to go to church, and rejoice. Rejoicing with the lower classes of our population means drinking, and there is not a day in the week on which the saloons are so crowded as on Sundays and holidays. It is very fortunate that the Russian is as good-natured and harmless in a drunken state as when he is sober, else it would be impossible to go out in the streets; for in some parts of our capitals every third man we meet is tipsy. In our smaller cities and villages, where the priest takes part in the rejoicings on the occasion of a christening, wedding, or burial, it is usually he who drinks most. The Russian peasant respects in the priest the representative of his beloved church: the intelligent man despises in him all that is greedy, dishonest, and intemperate. In olden times, meeting a priest in the early morning foreboded evil, which could only be forestalled by spitting three times on the ground. The social position of the priest is very low. The landed gentry invite him mostly on account of the many orthodox servants to bless the house. On these occasions he arrives in full state, accompanied by his deacon, who carries the incense-box, the contents of which are used in great quantities. The priests are invited on these occasions to partake of a meal, which is usually served apart from the family.

The country priest is very poor, as he entirely depends on the peasants, who have little more than their respect to offer him. Poverty has often driven these priests to steal and commit other crimes; but in the eyes of the peasant the catuschka ("little father") never loses his prestige. The country priest has, aside from the clerical instruction he receives at the seminary (insoluble for priests), no education whatever; but he is as good-natured, as hard-working, and as satisfied with fate as the peasant himself. The Russian priest has to get married before he takes orders, and his wife is mostly chosen for him while he is at the seminary.

As a rule, marriage is looked upon by the Russian peasant and the lower merchant class as an unavoidable evil; and, the sooner it is over, the better.

One day an opportunity was offered to me to see something of peasant life. My little maid, Mascha, presented herself before me, telling me that her mother had engaged her to be married, and that her formal betrothal was to take place the same evening.

"Do you know the man you are to marry?" I asked.

"No. Why should I know him? My mother knows him."

"But perhaps he will not please you when you see him."

"Perhaps. But the priest says it is my duty to obey my mother."

And Mascha makes the sign of the cross.

"May I assist at the ceremony of your betrothal?"

"Milosti prossim" ("We ask you heartily," says Mascha, her face beaming with hospitality.

I was anxious to see the man to whom my nice little maid was to be sacrificed, and I went.

On the threshold stood Mascha's parents, bowing low, and thanking me that I had honored them by my appearance. The room was crowded with friends and relatives, but the future bridegroom was not visible.

"He is gone to fetch the batuschka," said Mascha.

Meanwhile, an altar was erected in the corner under the image of the Holy Virgin. Two candles were lighted and placed upon the altar, on which stood a tall cake called kulitsch and a salt-cellar with salt. The priest arrived, followed by the fiancé, a boy of nineteen, and the deacon, who carried a Bible, a crucifix, and an incense-box, which he brandished all the time. The young people placed themselves before the altar, and the ceremony began. The priest first read a chapter from the Bible; while the whole assembly kept crossing themselves and falling on their knees, the forehead touching the ground. Then came the blessing of the priest, while the deacon repeated the "Gospode Ponnilui" ("Lord, be merciful to us") at least a hundred times, and in a most melancholy tone of voice. This finished, the affianced couple said the Lord's Prayer, and exchanged their brass rings. Now came the congratulations, beginning with the girl's mother, who took the cake and salt from the altar, while the father offered the young couple an image. Then the parents of the young man advanced. Both parents first offered their hand and then their face to be kissed.

Russian law considers a betrothal as valid as a marriage, and the breaking of an engagement is severely punished. I asked Mascha when her wedding was to be. "In a week," she answered cheerfully, although she knew quite well the sad, degrading position of a married woman of her class. A few proverbs will explain more than a description: "The Russian man does not love his wife if he does not beat her." "Love your wife as your soul, and shake her like an apple-tree." "Beat your wife once before dinner and once before supper." "The dog is more reasonable than a woman, for he never growls at his master." The Russian lower classes are not thrifty. Of course, they do not earn much; but the money they make is spent in the celebration of the numerous holidays and namesdays. On these occasions tea is drunk in such quantities that a looker-on might be alarmed. The peasant, if ever so poor, possesses a samovar, the indispensable household article of the czar as well as of the pauper. The samovar is made of silver, nickel, or brass; and the Russian imagines that water for tea is only good if it is boiled in the samovar (self-boiler). On holidays this article never leaves the table; and friends and relatives are invited, pitj tschai, to drink tea. The lower classes drink tea out of tumblers; and they drink it without sugar, mostly with jam and lemon. A person who has perhaps not tasted meat for weeks will not hesitate about spending the little money he has on tea of the best quality and dainties that go along with it. The main food of peasants is borscht,—a food prepared of beet-roots, —tchi (cabbage), and kascha (black porridge). These are the national dishes of our country, besides the ptrogg,—a big pie filled with chopped meat.

The servants never receive the food that is served on the table of their masters. They cling to the national dishes, which agree better with them than the dainty dishes of the French cook.

St. Petersburg, Russia.

THE INDIANS AND THE DAWES BILL.

BY JOHN J. JANNEY.

In the notice of the Lake Mohonk Conference, in its issue of October 17, the Register says: "The exemption from taxation on the part of Indians holding allotted lands has worked no end of trouble in every direction. It is a great pity that this could not have been foreseen by the framers of the severalty bill." It surely is a pity. It was foreseen by others. The writer opposed the enactment of the bill, among other reasons, because the Indian, holding his land clear of taxation, would surely get no protection from the State, and the moment he received his allotment he ceased to be a member of his tribe, and lost the protection of the government; and I wrote at the time that, if the act should be enforced in accordance with the design of its friends, "we might confidently expect that at the end of fifteen or twenty years from that time we shall have eighty or perhaps one hundred thousand pauper Indians, which the public, and not the government, will have to support."

The Register says: "But the truth is there was no thought at that time that the land would be allotted in hot haste to whole tribes at a time. It was supposed that here and there an Indian might be found progressive enough to want to take up land." That had been the practice for twenty years or more. That the law authorized; and, under wise agents, such as Gen. Milroy and Agent Edes, the Puyallups and neighboring tribes, with at least a thousand years of savage life behind them, and how much longer no one knows, were changed in one generation into a thrifty farming community, living on good farms, in good frame houses, better than their white neighbors. But the Dawes law did not contemplate any such process. It provides that the "President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, whenever in his opinion any reservation, or any part thereof, of such Indians is advantageous for agricultural or grazing purposes, to cause said reservation, or any part thereof, to be surveyed, or resurveyed, and to allot the lands in said reservation as follows," giving the amount to which every Indian is entitled. Section 2 provides "that all allotments set apart under the provisions of this act shall be selected by the Indians. . . . Provided that, if any one entitled to an allotment shall fail to make a selection within four years" after the President has directed allotments to be made, the Secretary of the Interior may have the allotment made by the proper Indian agent, or by a special agent. The Indian has no choice in the matter except to choose his land when directed to do so. The good of the Indian was not the purpose aimed at in the enactment of the law. If the land was not fit for "agricultural or grazing purposes," the Indian might keep it.

The avowed purpose of the law was to break up and destroy the tribal organization and the reservation, not piecemeal nor by degrees, but at once. The purpose of the law was tersely expressed by Lyman Abbott at the Mohonk Conference. He said: "The white settler looks across the border, and sees great prairies untouched by the plough. He sees thousands of acres of grass with only a few ponies grazing upon them. It is the great quantity of unused land that tempts his greed. . . . No one wants to live next to an Indian territory." No: he wants to own it.

All the information I have leads to the conclusion that the effort to force civilization on a blanket Indian by giving him a section of land, with the injunction that he must make a living from it or starve, will result in the latter.

But does the Register propose that the government shall pay the taxes on the Indians' lands out of money that belongs to the Indians? That would not be a wide departure from the government policy, but it surely would be no approach toward honesty.

Columbus, Ohio.

REV. CHARLES WARE PARK.

It is thirty-two years since the writer first saw Charles W. Park, the nephew of the famous Prof. Park of Andover, a bright-eyed, clean-hearted boy, just graduating at Phillips Academy. The acquaintance was resumed four years later, when the boy, grown to be a young man, was about to graduate at Amherst, at the head of his class save one. He had grown in many ways during those four years. Always a book-loving child, carefully trained in this by wise and tender parents, learning to love study from association with his father, a quiet country clergyman, he had thrown himself into college work with zeal, especially into such studies as astronomy, botany, and physics. He was a delightful companion then by night or by day, especially if the stars were out or the flowers were blooming; for he knew them all by name, and could introduce them as one would introduce a friend. But for his devotion to humanity he would have become a devout astronomer, but work for his fellow-beings appealed with greater force to his willing hands and strong heart. Even in college he was busy in trying to better the morals of those who needed help. There are those who can still recall the regular Sunday trips made by Mr. Park and three college mates to a neighboring village to conduct Sunday-school and religious service. The fact that they always went on a hand-car, lent for the purpose by the railroad officials, may have added an element of spice to the undertaking; but it was genuine good work that they did in that sleepy district.

We can also recall the pleasant fact that those were the days of "love's young dream"; for, about the time he won his laurels at college, he won the nobler gift of the hand of a charming girl, the daughter of Rev. Henry Ballantine, who for many years had been a missionary in India. This daughter was born there, and could speak the Marathi tongue like a native. Their engagement not only decided the question of foreign mission work which Mr. Park had been weighing in his mind, but probably led to the determination of the place where he should be sent by the American Board.

The next three years were spent in teaching for a time as principal of a school in Sherborn, Mass., and in theological study at Bangor and Andover. At the latter school he graduated, and was ordained in Amherst, June 14, 1870. The next day he and Miss Ballantine were married, and soon after were established in India as missionaries.

While yet a boy at Phillips Academy, Charles Park was one of the editors of the Phillipian, and his taste for editorial work was never lost. Not only did he preach and teach in India, beginning to preach in the vernacular nine months after landing,—a feat very seldom surpassed in that extremely difficult language,—but he soon established a valuable missionary quarterly, which for eight years he carried on, with the assistance of his able wife. He was also the English editor of an Anglo-Indian weekly in Bombay, and every year published a religious almanac. Besides all this editorial work, he found time to deliver various courses of lectures to the intelligent and thoughtful English-speaking Brahmans of Bombay, among whom his broad and sympathetic views secured him great respect and friendship,—a friendship which he warmly returned.

With all this amount of work in a hot climate, it is not strange that at the end of eleven years Mr. Park should have come back to this country for rest. Circumstances prevented his ever returning to his chosen field of work; but he was a man who always found plenty to do, and wherever he was placed did with his might what his hand found to do. For two years he preached here and there, under the auspices of the American Board, with which he was still connected. For two more he was settled over a church in New Haven. Then he was called to Birmingham, now Derby, Conn., where he ministered to a devoted flock for ten busy years, growing ever broader in his sympathies, and giving to his people his best and freest thought. His one aim was to find the truth; and, as fast as it was revealed to him, he gladly shared it with those who came to hear him.

By a curious geographical circumstance his parish was divided. Many of his parishioners lived in the borders of an adjoining town. When a new church was built in their immediate vicinity, it was easier for them to worship in Shelton than in Derby; and the division so weakened the society that it was no longer able to support a minister with a family of six young people to educate. So, with sore wrenching of heart, pastor and people parted; and a new home was found. This new home was in Pittsfield, Mass., where Mr. Park was called to take charge of Unity Church. He had entered upon his duties and preached two months when the germs of consumption, which those who loved him had long feared were at work in his system, sprang into sudden life; and, after a few weeks of suffering, he passed quietly away on Sunday night, the 24th of November, 1895.

There remain in the stricken home at Pittsfield Mrs. Park and four young daughters. The oldest daughter is in the graduating class at Wellesley, and the only son in the graduating class at Yale.

The loss of Mr. Park is a loss to the Church Universal, for he was a lover of truth and a fearless defender of what he believed to be right. A man of absolutely pure life and habits, tireless in study, genial in presence, warm-hearted and hospitable, his loss will be keenly felt in many homes besides his own.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

We have this week a new book which will be warmly welcomed by many,—“Historical and Other Papers,” by Rev. Grindall Reynolds, D.D. The book includes, in addition to the papers, seven of his sermons. The book is edited by his daughter, Mrs. Alice Reynolds Keyes. It has an introduction by Hon. George F. Hoar. We hope it will have a large sale. 499 pages. $2, net. This is the only new book we have to notice. The interest in Dr. Gordon's book, “The Christ of To-day,” remains unabated. It is doubtless one of the most valuable theological contributions of recent years, and one that must have a wide-spread influence with free-minded men of all denominations; for it breaks through many prejudices, and proclaims with no uncertain sound the new theology advocated by modern liberals of all denominations. This book and the volume of “Essays and Addresses,” by Phillips Brooks, published last year, ought to create a revolution in theology. Phillips Brooks said in this book: “We hear much to-day about the new theology: it is not a name, it is not a thing to fear. If man is really growing nearer to, and not farther away from, God, every advancing age must have a new theology. One may freely use that term, ‘the new theology,’ just as he freely speaks of the ‘new astronomy’ and the ‘new chemistry.’” Dr. Gordon has certainly done this very thing; and his theology is certainly new, when compared with that of the old catechisms and creeds of all orthodox churches.

Two new tracts are also now ready,—the Conference sermon, by Rev. M. J. Savage, “Our Gospel,” and “The Theology of Unitarians,” which is the remarkable paper given by Dr. Everett at the National Conference. Two more tracts—one by Rev. Mr. Gannett and one by Rev. Mr. Cuckson—will soon be ready.

FINANCES.

It is hardly necessary to add anything to what was said under this head last week. All that was then said is still true, and nothing specially encouraging can be said as yet. The contributions that are to come in will be watched with anxiety, and it is to be hoped that they will make it possible to speak more hopefully.

VISITS.

December 5 Women's Alliance meeting at Chelsea. Unfortunately, a heavy snow-storm prevented a full attendance. This society shows a determination to push ahead, and we have no doubt that its zeal and devotion will carry it through. December 8, Concord, N.H., a beautiful church in a beautiful city. This church impresses me as a very strong one, doing an excellent work. The day was a beautiful one, and a good congregation came out. The visit was very agreeable in all its features.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

The Sunday School.

The regular Channing Hall “talk” will be held next Saturday, December 14, at 25 Beacon Street, at 2.30, conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. The subject treated will be Lesson XIV., “The Ten Virgins.” All cordially invited.

Every Other Sunday for December 22 will be a Christmas number. It will contain a great variety of stories, poems, and illustrations appropriate to the season. Special liberties were given to Santa Claus, and he assumed the editorship of the paper for that issue. The young people will govern themselves accordingly, and bear in mind what they can obtain out of that paper at that time.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—The third regular meeting, thirteenth season, 1895-96, will be held in the parlors of the Church of the Disciples, corner of Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street, Monday, December 16, 1895. Subject, “The Mutual Relation of Minister and Sunday-school.” Speakers: Miss Margaret B. Barnard, Chelsea; Rev. William H. Fish, Jr., Dedham; Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge, Dorchester; Mr. Lyman M. Greenman, Cambridge; Rev. William H. Johnson, Cambridgeport; Rev. William H. Lyon, Roxbury; Mr. William I. Scandlin, Boston. Committee on Hospitality: Mrs. Christopher R. Eliot, Miss Bertha D. Eaton, Miss Frances I. Rust, Miss Emma W. Lee, Mr. Richard C. Humphreys.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. WILLIAM H. LYON of Roxbury will preach in the First Parish Church, Brookline, on Sunday next, December 15.

THE Worcester League of Unitarian Women will hold their December meeting on Wednesday, the 18th, at the Second Parish Church, Worcester. Morning session at eleven o'clock; afternoon session at two o'clock. Subject, “How shall Religion be made Manifest in the Home, in Social Relations, and in Politics?” All women are invited.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. John Cuckson will conduct the Wednesday noon service December 18.

Ministers' Monday Club, December 16, 10.30 A.M.: Rev. Henry C. McDougall will preside. Rev. John W. Day will give the essay on “The Preacher's Relation to Social Subjects.”

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): The attendance last Sunday evening to hear Mrs. Livermore was very large, the hall being crowded and many people standing. Her address was inspiring, portraying the possibilities of the human race in its future development. The number of men who attend this service is so large that comment has often been made upon that fact. While it is true that such a speaker as Mrs. Livermore draws out an overflowing audience, it is also a fact that speakers of less fame are heard by what would be called a very large congregation. This indicates that there is now created a regular following at Parker Memorial. Next Sunday evening, December 15, at 7.30, Rev. Thomas Van Ness of the Second Church, Boston, will speak. Subject, “The Heart of Socialism.” Special music. All seats free, and a welcome to all.

AUGUSTA, ME.—The union Thanksgiving services at the Unitarian church were, it is said, the largest attended of any that have ever been held here. It was a gathering assembled with the true spirit of Christianity in their hearts, a feeling of gratitude for the many blessings of life. There were present on the platform the following pastors of evangelical churches in the city: Rev. C. S. Cummings, Rev. J. M. Wyman, Rev. J. S. Williamson, Rev. E. C. Hayes, and Rev. C. A. Hayden. Rev. E. E. Newbert's sermon was followed with close attention. It was full of deep thought and high ideas.

ATHOL, MASS.—Second Church: A union service of the Advent, Baptist, Episcopal, Methodist, Trinitarian Congregational, First Congregational Unitarian, and Second Unitarian Churches was held Thanksgiving Day morning in the Second Unitarian Church. Two fine anthems were sung by the quartette. Rev. Mr. Mansfield (Methodist) preached a strong sermon from the text, “But sin is a reproach to any people.” The congregation was one of the largest that ever attended a Thanksgiving Day service.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.—Rev. Thomas J. Horner was installed as pastor of the Independent Congregational Church Wednesday, December 11. Rev. Charles G. Ames preached the sermon, Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett gave the right hand of fellowship, and Rev. B. R. Bulkeley addressed the people. Rev. A. W. Gould, Rev. G. W. Buckley, Mr. Albert C. Kingman, Rev. John C. Kimball, and Prof. Hamilton King also took part in the services. On the following day a joint conference of the liberal churches of Michigan was held here, in which State organization and missionary work, the Sunday-school problem, and the mission of a free church were discussed. Rev. John C. Kimball read a paper on “Is a Liberal Religion Capable of Inspiring its Adherents with Enthusiasm, Altruism, and Self-sacrifice?”

CANTON, MASS.—Rev. Henry F. Jenks occupied his pulpit last Sunday for the first time for four weeks, during which, with his wife and son, he has been travelling in the West, visiting Denver and Salt Lake City, in the former of which places, as well as in Chicago, he preached during his absence. In his sermon he spoke of the importance of consecration and self-restraint, of self-respect, and of the maintenance of a high ideal on the part of those who were engaged in carrying on our missionary enterprises in remote outposts as an element of success, and also of the importance of fostering the same qualities in our home churches, that those who grow up in them and go forth to engage in these new enterprises should do so with a lofty ideal of their faith, a persistent enthusiasm, and an earnest consecration that will enable them to triumph over discouragements, urging the duty of all, in both situations, for the sake of such others as they might influence by their characters and their example, to follow the example of Jesus, and sanctify, or consecrate, themselves.

CASTINE, ME.—Rev. Walter C. Green finishes his pastorate February 20, 1896.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.—Rev. Leslie W. Sprague and Rev. Lila Frost Sprague began their ministry at All Souls' Church December 1. Mrs. Sprague has begun the organization of the Sunday-school. The “Weekly Calendar” contains the usual statement of purpose and an invitation to the services and membership of the church.

CHELSEA, MASS.—Mr. George W. Stone, treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, addressed the Chelsea Branch of the National Women's Alliance Thursday evening, December 5.

CONCORD, N.H.—Rev. Frank L. Phalen preached an earnest sermon on “Responsibility,” December 8, urging the duties of Christian citizenship.

FARMINGTON, ME.—A correspondent writes: “A notable event in the religious life of this part of the State of Maine was the dedication, on December 5, of a Union Chapel at Fairbanks by representatives of the Methodist, Baptist, Orthodox Congregationalist, and Unitarian churches. Until quite recently no liberal service had been held in the village, and no one supposed for a moment that the Union Society would need the service of a Unitarian minister. But, by accident,—if one can speak of a funeral service as an accident,—the Unitarian minister at Farmington was called upon to speak of the gospel of the liberal faith. It became apparent very soon that there were quite a number of Unitarians at Fairbanks who were not themselves aware of the fact. Having heard one brief address, they decided that they must have more; and so an invitation came to Rev. W. H. Ramsay to hold regular services in a hall. The attendance has been remarkably good from the first. There have never been less than fifty, and twice we have had nearly sixty persons present. It is needless to say that these liberal services created a feeling of intense excitement in the community. Those who have been prominent workers in the ‘Evangelical’ services have shown bitter opposition. The brother who conducts the Union Sunday-school declared that Unitarians were ‘infidels.’ Meetings of counsel were held among the adherents of the old faith, and our services were ‘boycotted.’ But the boycott was innocuous. One thing was positively decided upon: the Unitarians must hold no service in the new chapel. This announcement brought the liberals, who had contributed to the building of the chapel, together. A meeting of all the contributors was called; and, very much to the astonishment of the ‘Evangelicals,’ it was found that a majority was in favor of giving the Unitarians and Orthodox Congregationalists an equal right with the Baptists and Methodists in the new chapel. So we are to have Unitarian services regularly at Fairbanks. It is not likely that any permanent liberal society will grow out of this movement; nor is it, perhaps, desirable. But the movement will help to strengthen our work here in Farmington, as well as to spread the leaven of liberal thought among a large number of people, whom otherwise we should not be likely to reach.”

HOLYOKE, MASS.—Much to the regret of the Holyoke church, Rev. J. W. Carney has sent in his resignation. He has been too ill to conduct the work with any satisfaction to himself, and will for the present take a vacation. Speaking of his resignation, one of the Holyoke papers says: “His friends are not confined to any denomination; and his popularity, because of his breadth and liberality, was fully attested to by the remarkably warm greeting accorded

CHANDLER & CO.

Christmas Opening

Duchesse Gloves.

Nothing but the best quality will do for a Christmas Gift, and a box of nice gloves is always sure to please. Those who buy the DUCHESS GLOVE have the Best Glove made.

CHANDLER & CO.

Winter Street, Boston.

him at the big anniversary celebration of the St. Jerome society a year ago. Holyoke will lose a great, big, whole-souled nobleman in Rev. J. W. Carney."

MEADVILLE, PA.—A correspondent writes: "The situation in Meadville is most encouraging. The morning congregations have been exceptionally large, and new families are coming in. Mr. Lawrance has preached every Sunday since the church reopened the 1st of September, except that he exchanged with Miss Buck in November. His health and vigor seem entirely restored. Dr. Mayo is to preach on the 15th inst., on which day Mr. Lawrance goes to Buffalo. The Sunday-school is growing steadily. It recently received the gift of a large and beautiful American flag from the Young Ladies' Auxiliary, and on November 24 a patriotic service was held to accept and dedicate it. The 'Look-up League' (Guild) has charge of the evening services, which begin with a half-hour of song service led by Mr. Lawrance, after which follow the league service proper and a paper. Recent essayists have spoken on 'Augustine,' 'Saint Bernard,' 'Phillips Brooks,' 'Stopford Brooke,' 'The Enforcement of Law,' 'Evolution and the Future,' and 'Recent Religious Music.' Dr. Mayo is to address the league on two Sunday evenings. Much interest is taken in the proposed federation of young people's societies, and at the last meeting the league voted informally upon the question of a name. Seven preferred the name 'Unitarian Union,' ten voted for 'Christian Union,' and twenty-seven for 'Religious Union,' to which some added the words 'of the Unitarian Church.' In the Divinity School there are thirty-one students in residence. Just now the chief interest centres in the special lectures by non-resident instructors. Rev. J. L. Corning gave a series of ten illustrated lectures on 'The History of Art,' coming from Munich for that purpose. They were largely attended, some of the audiences testing the capacity of the church to the utmost. At present Dr. Lyman Abbott is delivering a course of eight lectures, extending over two weeks, on 'Christianity and the Social Problems.' These are so highly appreciated in the city that not only are all the seats in the church occupied, but the aisles and the space about the pulpit are also filled. At least one evangelical church holds its prayer-meetings at an earlier hour, that the minister and his people may attend. Dr. Mayo follows, beginning the next week after Dr. Abbott concludes. These lectures are most useful to the students, and are helpful to our cause in the city. Mr. Lawrance is a member of the Ministerial Association of Meadville, and had a prominent part in the union Thanksgiving service. The church and school command the respect of the people of Meadville."

NORTHBORO, MASS.—Josiah Coleman Kent began his permanent work as pastor of the church here December 1, and is to be ordained and installed soon. Rev. Joseph H. Allen will preach the installing sermon.

PROVIDENCE, R.I.—There will be a commemorative service to Dr. Woodbury at the Westminster Church at 4 P.M., next Sunday. The Sunday meetings of the Fourth Society have been closed indefinitely. On the following Sunday, however, a new movement was begun in another portion of the city adjoining, known as Elmwood. The interest and promise are good.

WALPOLE, N.H.—This society, which has been hearing candidates, has been much pleased with the services of Rev. F. W. Pratt. That gentleman, who has been seriously ill, is rapidly recovering, and will very likely preach in Walpole the 15th inst.

WHITMAN, MASS.—Our society in Whitman has extended a unanimous vote to Rev. H. D. Stevens to become its pastor. If he accepts, the society will undoubtedly prosper under his ministry, and become one of our established and influential churches.

WORCESTER, MASS.—Rev. William Everett will preach here next Sunday, the 15th inst. in the Church of the Unity.

ENGLAND.—Rev. Minot J. Savage, who delivered the opening sermon at the recent Unitarian Conference at Washington, also gave the closing address. His sermon was a magnificent utterance of the "good news" of Unitarianism to the world, and it is not surprising to hear that an audience of far above a thousand listened to it intently. We are glad to be able to state that English Unitarians will have an opportunity of hearing Mr. Savage next June. It may be remembered that, at the recent council meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the secretary stated, on behalf of the executive, that it was then impossible to announce the name of the Essex Hall lecturer for 1896, as negotiations were still pending. Dr. Herford has since reported on his return from America that Mr. Savage consents to deliver the lecture, the object of which will be to give a presentation of religious thought in the light of the doctrine of evolution. Those to whom Mr. Savage's writings are at all familiar will expect a great treat on this occasion.—The Inquirer.

SUMMER PREACHING.—The superintendent for New England succeeded this year in securing more than the usual number of places for students to preach during their summer vacation. Mr. S. L. Elberfeld was stationed at Middlesex, Vt. There he preached in the Union Church, to a congregation of from forty to forty-five. He also preached in Middlesex Centre, four miles away, where he had a congregation of about thirty. In both these places he succeeded, during his three months' stay, in increasing the interest in liberal Christianity. Rev. J. Edward Wright of Montpelier, bishop of all that centre, commends the work done by Mr. Elberfeld. Charles H. Porter, Jr., went to West Gouldsboro, Me., where he won the affection of the entire town by his attractive personality and profitable services. Our cause was much advanced during his stay. At Prospect Harbor, near by, Rev. C. A. Langston conducted services to the great satisfaction of the liberal people in that community. His congregation averaged about forty, and he aimed with measurable success to make the church life more organic and to deepen the church idea. Winter Harbor was supplied by the occasional preacher from Bar Harbor and elsewhere. Mr. Flint, who has done so much for this place, had charge of the services. Mr. F. C. Brown from Meadville went to Warren, Vt. He found a congregation discouraged by removals. He renewed their spirit, and drew a congregation averaging about forty. He also went over to Waitsfield, a neighboring town, and brought back to life a little society there, preaching to about fifty people on the average. The work he did was surprisingly good in its results. Farther up in Vermont, at East Charleston, Mr. Greenman from Cambridge carried on the work so successfully begun by Mr. Reccord last year. Unitarian preaching is a new thing to the people in this neighborhood; but it is gladly received, the congregations sometimes numbering as high as seventy-five and over. It is a good place to sow the liberal seed, as there are several thriving communities in the neighborhood. In Sullivan, Me., the services were conducted by Rev. T. J. Horner; and something was accomplished toward getting the people there to organize a liberal Union Church. In the town of South Hope, Me., Unitarian services were held for the first time. Mr. E. P. Pressey went there for three Sundays, with the condition that they would ask him to preach further if he was liked. He remained during the rest of the summer, having an average congregation of over twenty. Rev. L. M. Barrington, one of our older ministers, residing in Belfast, went regularly to Stockton Springs, Me., during the summer, holding the only religious services conducted in the town. It is his hope that the people will unite in these services, and that they may be held regularly throughout the year. In Fitzwilliam, Mass., Rev. Mrs. M. C. Aitkin preached during the entire summer. This is the little church to which Rev. Dr. Reynolds ministered so successfully during his vacations. In Sudbury, Mass., there has been an awakening of the church under the preaching of Rev. C. W. Heizer, who during the summer and up to the present time has been going over from his parish in Wayland. Several other places indicated that by next summer they would like to have preachers, and the outlook is very good for the employment of a still larger number of students. D. M. W.

General Religious Notes.

Rev. Dr. John Barrows of Chicago will go to Calcutta to give his lectures on the foundation established by Mr. Haskell.

The new chaplain of the House of Representatives, Rev. Henry N. Couden of Michigan, is a Universalist. This is the first time in the history of Congress that a Universalist has been chosen for this position. Mr. Couden is totally blind. He is a graduate of the Canton Theological School, and he is an interesting public speaker.

The Church Missionary Intelligencer says that Rome has, with flexibility and absoluteness, changed front in Uganda. The French bishop, Monsignor Hirth, has been replaced by an Englishman, who has taken out with him a body of English priests. Bishop Hanion is a Manchester man, and was formerly a missionary at Seh in Sakh.

Dr. Selah Merrill, formerly United States consul at Jerusalem, says that of the 47,000 inhabitants of the Holy City 27,000 are Jews. "It appears from recent statistics that the idea of Hebrew being a dead language must be classed as a popular delusion. More people to-day are using Hebrew as a literary vehicle than when Moses drove his chariot through the Red Sea.

Shakspeare and Goethe have been completely translated into Hebrew, and are read with avidity by thousands who enjoy at the same time the sublime poetry of Isaiah and Solomon, the son of David."

The Danes are nearly all Protestants, the Catholics and Jews numbering less than ten thousand. But the number of Catholics is increasing; and, according to their own figures, the relative progress is enormous, unless it includes a movement of immigration as well as of conversion. As for the Jews, their number is growing less continually, and has diminished one-third since 1860.

The Evangelical Free Churches of Bristol and district have united in a council for common work. The constitution states the following as some of the objects proposed: "the formation of districts for house-to-house visitation, supplying the religious needs of hospitals, workhouses, and similar institutions, to take action on questions relating to education, religious persecution, disabilities, or intolerance in urban and rural districts, to disseminate Free Church principles by means of lectures, public meetings, etc." It is supported by all the churches.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of the Unitarian Sunday School Society. Donations since Oct. 1, 1895:—

Oct.	2. Channing Memorial Church, Newport	$20.00
"	9. First Independent Christ Church, Baltimore.....	5.00
"	10. Dedham First Parish.....	14.24
"	17. Brighton First Parish Sunday-school.....	10.00
"	21. Keene (N.H.) Sunday-school.....	10.00
"	25. Sandwich Sunday-school.....	2.50
"	28. Hubbardston Sunday-school.....	2.50
Nov.	6. Toronto (Can.) Sunday-school.....	5.00
"	13. Henry Humphreys.....	10.00
"	13. Mrs. Otis Norcross.....	10.00
"	13. Ebed L. Ripley.....	10.00
"	13. R. C. Billings.....	10.00
"	13. E. B. Haskell.....	10.00
"	13. S. A. Carlton.....	10.00
"	13. Henry L. Pierce.....	10.00
"	13. Franklin King.....	10.00
"	13. John Capen.....	20.00
"	14. Mrs. S. W. Farwell.....	10.00
"	14. Mrs. Susan E. Cabot.....	50.00
"	14. F. H. Peabody.....	10.00
"	14. Thomas Gaffield.....	10.00
"	14. Wm. Endicott, Jr.....	10.00
"	14. Mrs. E. M. Barnard.....	20.00
"	14. Otis E. Weld.....	10.00
"	14. H. H. Hunnewell.....	10.00
"	14. Nathaniel P. Jones.....	10.00
"	14. Hartley Lord.....	10.00
"	14. Oakes A. Ames.....	10.00
"	14. G. W. Clark.....	25.00
"	14. Mrs. W. W. Warren.....	10.00
"	16. Caleb Chase.....	10.00
"	16. Mrs. Anna C. Rumrill.....	10.00
"	16. Joseph B. Glover.....	10.00
"	16. Rev. Samuel May.....	10.00
"	16. Mrs. F. L. Ames.....	25.00
"	18. Beachmont Sunday-school.....	3.00
"	20. Lucius G. Pratt.....	10.00
"	20. James W. Tufts.....	10.00
"	20. Mrs. Edward Chase.....	10.00
"	20. Mrs. John Capen.....	10.00
"	20. Augustus Flag.....	10.00
"	20. Milton Reed.....	2.00
"	21. Dorman B. Eaton.....	15.00
"	21. Arthur F. Estabrook.....	10.00
"	21. Jesse Metcalf.....	10.00
"	21. Miss E. A. Haven.....	10.00
"	23. John C. Haynes.....	15.00
"	23. H. S. Grew.....	10.00
"	23. D. W. King.....	10.00
"	23. John C. Olin.....	10.00
"	23. Mrs. John Lowell.....	10.00
"	25. Mrs. T. Talbot.....	10.00
"	26. South Church Charity Fund, Portsmouth.....	25.00
"	29. Frederic H. Hedge.....	5.00
"	29. George H. Eager.....	10.00
"	29. Miss A. E. Appleton.....	10.00
"	30. Cambridge First Parish Sunday-school.....	25.00
Dec.	3. Winchester Sunday-school.....	10.00
"	3. New Bedford First Congregational Society.....	25.00
"	3. Thompson Baxter.....	10.00
"	3. George Hutchinson.....	5.00
"	3. A. Friend.....	10.00
"	3. Charles W. Parker.....	10.00
"	7. Miss A. P. Rogers.....	10.00

RICHARD C. HUMPHREYS, Treas.

PLYMOUTH PILGRIM MEMORIAL CHURCH.

John D. Long, 5 Tremont Street, Boston, for the committee on rebuilding the above church, acknowledges receipt of the following contributions:—

Previously acknowledged.....	$2,427.46
May 20. Women's Alliance, Hingham.....	50.00
Aug. 21. H. S. Marcy, Belmont.....	25.00
Nov. 26. Geo. L. Stratton, Concord, N.H.....	10.00
Nov. 29. Two friends, Worcester.....	2.00
Dec. 4. John Capen, Boston.....	20.00

Dec. 4, 1895. $2,534.46

Business Notices.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are of great service in subduing Hoarseness and Coughs. Sold only in boxes. Avoid imitations.

A Tour through Unfamiliar Lands.—Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb will send a small tourist party abroad January 15 for a novel Old World tour. Landing at Naples, the travellers will visit the interesting parts of Southern Italy, including Rome and the picturesque regions lying about Naples, and thereafter make an extended round of Sicily. Tunis and Algeria will next be visited; and the latter country especially will be widely traversed from the Tunis boundaries to the borders of Morocco, and from the Mediterranean shores to the great range of the Atlas Mountains. At one point the mountain wall will be crossed, and there will be a visit to the quaint desert town of Biskra. Southern Spain will also be seen, and there will be an opportunity to join a party for a more comprehensive round through the latter country and to other parts of Europe. A party which is to devote its attention to Spain, Portugal, France, etc., will sail from New York March 21. A circular giving all needed details may be obtained by addressing Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, Boston.

$3.50 Gift.—In another part of this paper there is the announcement of a very low price made by the Paine Furniture Co. on some fourfold Japanese Art Screens. They make a very acceptable Xmas gift at a very moderate cost.

Holiday Tours to Washington and Atlanta.—A special holiday tour via Royal Blue Line leaves Boston for Washington, D.C., Thursday, December 26. Trip occupies seven days, and rate covering hotel accommodations and every expense is but $23. On same date a party leaves Boston for the Atlanta Exposition, stopping at Philadelphia, Luray, Natural Bridge, Chattanooga, etc. Time occupied ten days; rate $58. Both parties personally conducted. For itineraries, address A. J. Simmons, N. E. P. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Tyngsboro, 4th inst., by Rev. William Brown, John Monahan and Mabel Chick, both of Tyngsboro.

Deaths.

At her home in Darien, Conn., 28th ult., Mrs. Adelaide C. Bass.

Mrs. Bass was born in Boston, June 7, 1816, and was the daughter of Otis Norcross and Mary Cunningham Homer. She was married in 1844 to John W. Bass of Boston. Six children were born to them, two of whom died in early childhood. The four surviving children are John W., Adelaide N., Stephen G., and Mary C. In 1855 Mrs. Bass moved West with her family, and after a short residence in several Western towns finally settled in Quincy, Ill. In 1875 Mr. Bass died, and his remains were interred in Mount Auburn. In 1888 Mrs. Bass moved to Darien, Conn., where she has since resided. For sixty-nine years Mrs. Bass has been a devoted member of the Unitarian church. At the age of ten years she was baptized into the service of Christ and the faith of the liberal church, Rev. Dr. Samuel Barrett officiating. When the Unitarian society of Darien was organized, Mrs. Bass was the first person to sign the covenant. Her life has been given to the practice of good works, and the influence of her beautiful character will live on for all time. The keynote of that character was hope. No gloomy fears were hers even when she knew that she must bid farewell, for "earth's little while," to those she loved there best. May her bright, brave cheerfulness follow them, as it did her, even to the "valley of the shadow."

"Till just as any other friend's they press
Death's hand, and, having died, feel none the less
How beautiful it is to be alive!"

Her funeral took place from her late residence in Darien on Saturday, November 30, and was conducted by Rev. W. L. Utley, pastor of the Unitarian society of Darien. Later burial services were conducted at Mount Auburn by Rev. Mr. Horton of Boston.

Thus another of the saints has been gathered home. Her marriage was a happy one, and the home life will always be an inspiration to her children.

"Perhaps in that miracle country
They will give her lost youth back,
And the flowers of a vanished springtime
Will bloom in their spirits' track.
One draught from the living waters
Shall call back his manhood's prime,
And eternal years shall measure
A love that outlasted time."

Don't let the ✱ Baby Die

from want of nourishment.

Thousands of them succumb from this cause daily. No fault of the parents either, simply they are unable to find food that can be retained by the poor, weak stomachs, and then that continual decrease in weight, that pinched and forlorn look on the little face with the inevitable end.

Try while there is yet life and be rewarded with happy success, as thousands have done before you, that greatest of food products

Bovinine

It is a concentration in the least possible bulk of the life-maintaining elements of lean, raw beef, prepared by a special cold process. A few drops added to babies' milk will make rich, new blood, create flesh and bone, and give the necessary strength to the vital organs to start them on their long life's work. Cholera infantum and bowel troubles are prevented by its use. Over

25000 physicians endorse it.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Sermon Gleanings.

SPIRITUAL INSIGHT.

To see the immanent Spirit enveloping the universe means that glorious omnipresence of which nature is the fitting temple. It enlivens, inspires, intoxicates the seer, and obliterates all sense of the meanness and misery of life. The interpretation of God in nature shall one day furnish a new world to religion and a new wisdom of all things. The Isopanishad says: "Whatever objects there are inside the universe are infused with the Spirit of God." "For-sake all earthly temptations, and enjoy him. Do not covet other men's wealth." "On all four sides is the Eternal spread out. On all four sides is the Infinite, and what seems to be the finite. He who is the Supporter of the universe knows all: knowing the past and future of all things, his Spirit moves in it." When the intensity of spiritual immanence was realized thus, the ancient Hindu could not but perceive that God was in his heart also. Faith in the Indweller necessarily follows the conscious presence of the Spirit in all things. Nay, it is the Presence within that projects itself upon all matters of perception. There is nothing truly profound observed without that did not at first arise within. When faith in the revelation of God does not embody itself in beholding his Spirit permeate all time and all space, and when his self-revelation does not open unsuspected depths in man's own soul, well may we doubt whether the revelation is genuine revelation at all. The Upanishads are full of this profound insight: "In the great, golden recess of the soul the immaculate essence of Brahma abides. He is the white light,—the light of all lights." "That glorious sinless One dwells inside the body, inside the mind. The man of communion, when he has purged himself from sin, beholds him." "He abides in the soul; but the soul knows him not, he of whom the soul is like unto a body, who rules the soul, he is the Immortal, the great Person." This is not far from "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." See God where? Not "Lo! here," "Lo! there," but within thyself. Nay, only too often and too repeatedly is the sentiment harped upon that the presence of God is to be realized in the heart only: that insight, wisdom, communion, and ascetic self discipline are the means of purifying the inner perception; that passion, sin, and mental obscurity inevitably obscure the medium of vision. The weakness of man to effect this internal purification is once or twice confessed in accents of Pauline tenderness. Every Hindu quotes the well-known verse from the Vishnu Dharmottara: "I know what is righteousness, but I have not the readiness to perform it. I know what is unrighteousness, but have not the power to abstain from it. O Rhishikesa, thou art in my heart. Dispose of me as thou wouldst, and I would act accordingly." The ring of the apostle's cry faintly echoes in the ear: "The good that I would I do not, but the evil that I would not that I do."

In the future dispensation of the ways of the Spirit the Hindu religion will surely play a prominent part, because at every step profound responses meet the seeker of God in all his lofty aspirations amid the world of Hindu spiritualities. Their helpfulness and truthfulness are without end, though, indeed, care and discretion be needed in their study. Some day, when the one great Spirit-God is worshipped all the world over, the unbroken continuity of the race of spiritual men, wherever born, shall be established. But all great accomplishment of ideal, while it re-explains the past and inspires profound impulses in the present, must be a hope and a promise, and rest with the future for its final effect. Does not this mean ceaseless prayer, ceaseless faith, and ceaseless work on our part? The dispensation of the Spirit is a daily unfolding, a daily light and progress for the individual and for the race. When in this blessed though difficult process no personal experiences, even of the meanest of God's apostles, can be set aside, who dare think that the spiritual history of one of the most contemplative races of the world is to be ignored? But, to be included among the children of light, we must claim no more than is our due. We must be always conscious of our want, one-sidedness, and ignorance, always hail the Spirit's guidance and self-revelation from whithersoever it may come, give honor to all ages and the dealings of God with his people everywhere.—From "The Spirit of God," by P. C. Mozoomdar.

Literature.

"STOPS OF VARIOUS QUILLS."*

Mr. Howells was a writer of poetry in the earlier part of his career, but concluded that poetry was not his true vocation, and for a long time left it entirely in abeyance. A rumor says that this was a great disappointment to him, that to be a poet was his heart's desire. Emerson quotes somewhere, "What we desire in youth comes to us in heaps in old age." The application of the proverb to Mr. Howells is not complete. He has not yet attained to old age; and he has neither given us a heap of poetry now, nor is he likely to reap from it a heap of popular fame. But these forty-three poems are of such force, such individuality, and such significance that they may well raise the question whether in the whole range of his prose writing, admire that as we may and must, there is anything which rises so securely into the height of genius as do these poems. They have every one of the three notes on which Matthew Arnold insisted so vehemently. They are "simple, sensuous, impassioned." But Arnold did Milton much wrong in quoting these words as an exhaustive statement of what good poetry should be, and Mr. Howells's poems lack one note which is essential to the best poetry. They are not musical. They do not sing; nor are they poems that are likely to command a popular appreciation, notwithstanding the fact that their sympathy with the heart of popular defect and misery is one of their most striking notes. Several of them reflect Mr. Howells's well-known tendency to the socialistic criticism on the present order of society. It is a tendency most creditable to Mr. Howells's heart, but less so to his head. The incongruities of our social state are horrible, but that Mr. Howells's remedy would be worse than the disease seems not impossible. The subjects of several of the poems will give some idea of their character and range: "Race," "Temperament," "Society," "Good Society," "Hereditry." But in many others the title is the "x" of algebra, and one must read the poem to know what the title stands for: "If," for example, and "Question" and "From Generation to Generation,"—an old bottle in which the wine is new and strange. One of the shortest is called "Calvary." Its real subject is the damnation of a mean success. It is a poem to make many hundreds shiver on the warmest day. Since Jesus made that bitter cry upon the cross, his words have never, we imagine, been turned to such unique account and enforced such a terrible lesson:—

"If He could doubt on his triumphant cross,
How much more I, in the defeat and loss
Of seeing all my selfish dreams fulfilled,
Of having lived the very life I willed,
Of being all that I desired to be.
My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

There are several of the poems that have, in a hardly less degree, this searching ethical quality. They hold the mirror up to many a secret fault. And there is blame for God as well as man. A different strain—the tenderest and most beautiful of all—is that called "Change." It must have come out of the writer's own experience of parental loss. Here is no painted flame, but one that actually burns.

The outward beauty of the book deserves the warmest praise. Mr. Pyle's illustrations are in perfect sympathy with Mr. Howells's text. But there is a fly in the ointment. There is no paging to the book, and there are no numbers to the pieces corresponding to those in the table of contents. Consequently, the search for an individual piece is sometimes maddening. Secure of his possession of this treasure, the judicious reader will proceed to number the pieces for himself as neatly as may be.

ANIMA POETÆ. From the unpublished note-books of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—From 1795 to 1832 Coleridge filled more than fifty note-books with his thoughts on various subjects; and from these Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge, the competent and careful editor of the "Coleridge Letters" that appeared a few months ago, has made an admirable selection. They take a wide range. Some of them show a remarkably observant mind, especially of cloud scenery and meteorological effects. In some of these we breathe an atmosphere very much like that which we have in some parts of "The Ancient Mariner"; and we are made aware that the meteorological elements of that wonderful poem were not by any means developed out of his inner consciousness, and that the lovely sonnet, "Fancy in Nubibus," was the exponent of a pretty constant habit of the writer's mind. There are, besides these concrete parts, many reflections on men and books and all sorts of ethical, philosophic, and religious problems. There is much interest in dreams, and here and there passages which do not seem unrelated to the writer's opium habit. Some of the ethical notes are very penetrating; but the theology tends to a theosophical presumption and obscurity in many places. Taken altogether, the book is one that no lover of Coleridge can afford to do without; and, if strangers to his genius make a trial of it, they will be pretty sure to look up "The Friend," the "Biographia Literaria," and the "Aids to Reflection." The scope of the book is quite different from the "Table Talk," and we are nowhere surer that we have exactly his own thought than there. The book is a distinct addition to a body of literature which was already remarkably rich.

*"STOPS OF VARIOUS QUILLS. By W. D. Howells. Illustrated by Howard Pyle. New York: Harper & Brothers.

LAST POEMS OF JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—It was fit that these poems should be brought together in this lovely brochure by themselves, before their incorporation, which should not be long delayed, in the edition of Lowell's collected works. We have had no better picture of the later Lowell than the frontispiece here, and it is interesting to find that its reminiscence of Rowse's portrait is quite positive. Lowell's friends must have stood somewhat in awe of him, or he would never have trained his mustache in such an affected and highly fantastical manner. The poems are but ten in all, and three of these stand out from the others as pre-eminently the best. These are "The Nobler Lover," "Turner's 'Old Téméraire,'" and the lines "On a Bust of Gen. Grant." These last tell the plain truth concerning Grant, and are no mere panegyric. The poem on Turner's famous picture is remarkable. It is a splendid metaphor in ten stanzas,—a metaphor because throughout he is speaking simultaneously of the old war-ship and the Church. "It is magnificent, but it is not"—what Lowell felt as a man, and not merely as a poet. He would not have had the Church of Hildebrand back again. And he did not really think so ill of science, whose type he finds in the tug—"a black demon, belching fire and steam"—which is dragging the fighting "Téméraire" to her last moorings. Nevertheless, it is a great poem, rich in splendid lines and phrases; and the scientist would be churlish who could not enjoy it, notwithstanding the scunner that it takes at him and all his ways.

RED ROWANS. By Mrs. F. A. Steel, author of "Miss Stuart's Legacy," etc. New York: Macmillan & Co.—It would appear from this book that the course of vagrant fancy sometimes does not run any smoother than that of true love. There is true love in the book, but not much of it is in the hero's breast. He is a most unheroic hero, going from one girl to another, and working not a little damage on the way. At last he seems to settle on a particular flower, which might be called a golden coreopsis. That is to say, he concludes to club his fortune with a lady's that attracts his selfish greed. But his goes to pieces, and hers cannot be made to combine with the fragments. Whereupon he makes a virtue of necessity, and carries his "routed leavings" to the girl whom he had loved the most of all the general choir. The reader takes a mournful pleasure in her death as a kind of poetic justice; but to his serious disappointment the woman he had served the worst comes to the rescue, and coddles him in his despair. Why the book was written is not plain. The only moral seems to be upon what worthless men good women waste their hearts. What is certain, however, is that the drawing of the several characters is admirably done.

ECHOES FROM THE SABINE FARM. By Eugene and Roswell Martin Field. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—The recent death of Mr. Eugene Field gives a pathetic interest to this volume of Horatian verse, sounding so merrily when the hand that wrote it has forgotten how to hold the pen. It is another evidence of his remarkable facility,—a facility that gave us frequently a moment's pleasure, but little that has any staying quality. Improvisation is a pleasant gift; but Thoreau was right when he declared,

"If, with light head erect, I sing," it does not greatly matter. A few tender notes of tenderest parental love and grief, such as "The Little Boy ben always in the Way," and "The Tin Soldier," and, in prose, "The Yaller Baby," will outlast the rest of his production, and especially these "Echoes," some of which are very clear in their Horatian note, pretty close translations of the "Odes," while others are the freest paraphrases, or even burlesques, of the originals. Some will laugh, but others will resent the incongruity of the old Roman singer dressed in modern clothes, and talking modern slang. They will recall a certain essay of George Eliot's in "Theophrastus Such," which was called "Debas-ing the Moral Currency." Perhaps these echoes and travesties would not be fairly amenable to the strictures of that essay on the parodying of noble things; but, if they escaped, it would be by a narrow chance.

A MAD MADONNA, AND OTHER STORIES. By L. Clarkson Whitelock. Boston: Joseph Knight Company.—The six stories of this collection have all a mystic and far-away quality; and most of them are based on the love of art, seeking to express artistic longings. The Sistine Madonna leaves her corner room in Dresden, and seeks through Italy for Raphael, with this prayer in her heart: "I would be as other women are. Thou hast made us immortal in the likeness of this flesh. We cannot die and be at rest as others are. We would die and be forgotten." The unknown painter of "La Velata" in the Uffizi Palace haunts the gallery, bewailing the cruel fate of one who won the right to be in that company of painters, and must yet remain nameless. Clarion Vaughan, the living embodiment of the Apollo, shows the Greek type in the midst of nineteenth century life, "joyous in a world that has forgotten to be glad." The stories are original in conception. Photographs of the Sistine Madonna, the Apollo, the Velata, Lake Thun, the Uffizi Palace, etc., add to the interest of the book.

THE WERNER PRIMER. By F. Lilian Taylor. Chicago, New York, and Boston: The Werner Company. Price 30 cents.—The beautiful little "Werner Primer" is certainly one of the best first readers that has ever come to our notice. No child, teacher, or parent could fail to be delighted with it. The once dark and stony road to knowledge for little feet has gradually been cleared till few obstructions remain; and particularly in texts for the lowest grades

$3.50 GIFT.

These are the well-known Japanese 4-fold Art Screens. Within a year they have sold elsewhere as high as $15. The regular price in Oriental stores is $9. Our Christmas price for them after to-day will be $3.50. They are splendidly made. The frames are in close sections, cross-ribbed at intervals of six inches, with mortised joints. With ordinary care they will last a lifetime.

The screen when opened measures 67 by 88 inches. It is covered on both sides with heavy Art Chintz. In a deep indigo cloth panel on the front are storks, reeds, etc., hand-embroidered in gold. We warrant this gold not to tarnish.

The reverse side is covered in a dull red, flowered in silver. Extra stout hinges. These screens are very close folding. As an inexpensive Holiday Gift it has no equal.

PAINÉ FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

have light and air and beauty been let in to an extent undreamed of by the old-time teachers. The arrangement of the book is based on the latest scientific ideas of how reading should be taught, and so embodies and develops the Froebelian principles as to make it exactly the book to fill the gap existing between the kindergarten and primary classes. Children will be at once interested and attracted by the novel innovation of colored pictures and by the great variety of work presented; while teachers will find it rich in devices and suggestions for lessons in number, color, writing, and drawing.

FROM DREAMLAND SENT. By Lilian Whiting. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—The wonder is not that we have so many poets writing in these days, nor that so many write with ease, but that so much of their poetry is really good. Miss Whiting's is not of the best among the many who compose the general choir; but it is all the better because a great deal of it has been written from the impulses of friendship and affection, without one side glance at the prospects of the rewards of publication. The personal equation is so prominent that the poems here collected must have given the editors very little trouble and the friends for whom they were written a great deal of pleasure. The quality is distinctly lyrical. They sing, and yet they sing a little out of tune, there being a good many lines that are not musical. Of curious felicity in the choice of words and phrases there is very little. There is much more expression of feeling than of thought; but it is genuine feeling, and makes us friends with one who clearly enough likes to be liked and to give love for love.

OAKLEIGH. By Ellen Douglas Deland. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This is a young people's story. The situation is that of an older daughter who, on the death of her mother, succeeds to the charge of her father's house. She has a good deal of trouble with her smallest sisters, a sister younger than herself doing rather better. Then the father marries again, and there are new and interesting complications. The oldest daughter is decidedly intractable to the new mother, but she is conquered by her affection in the end. A brother of the new wife has a wildish streak in him, and gets into pecuniary perplexity, but pulls himself together handsomely, and marries one of his sister's step-daughters. There is a good old aunt in the story, who does herself great credit, and adds much to the reader's pleasure. A nice, simple, pleasant book.

LITTLE JOLLIBY'S CHRISTMAS. By Mrs. Harriet A. Cheever. Boston and Chicago: Congregational Sunday School and Publishing Society.—Little Jolliby was an invalid hunchback boy who for two years was one of a group of little ones in a home for the friendless. His sweetness of spirit, combined with a gift for story-telling, made him the peacemaker among the children. It is not a story for very little ones, nor for Unitarian children, who would be confused by the transformation of the New Testament Jesus into the Christ to whom the children pray for forgiveness of sin. Written for orthodox Sunday-schools, it will find its mission there. Our children should learn that the dear Father is "the Loveliest One," and that they can come to his love as to an earthly father's, without a mediator to plead for them.

THE TIGER OF MYSORE. By G. A. Henty. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.—There is certainly a great deal to commend in the books for boys which Mr. Henty sends out so punctually year after year. They are clean and manly in tone and instructive in setting. They presuppose a certain degree of intelligence in their youthful readers, which is more than can be said for most books of adventure, written for boys. They introduce boys to foreign scenes and historical periods; and the unusual feats of valor performed by the young heroes are quite legitimate under the circumstances. This is a story of the war with Tippoo Saib, which offers abundant material for incidents of danger and heroism.

DR. MILLER'S YEAR BOOK: A YEAR'S DAILY READINGS. By J. R. Miller, D.D. New York, 46 East Fourteenth Street, and Boston, 100 Purchase Street: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—In this volume we have another of the practical manuals which are becoming so common. For each day there is a Bible text, oft-times only a fragment, followed by selections of prose and poetry which illustrate the text. A large part of the present book contains matter which is both new and interesting. The thought is put into an interesting form, and is fertile in suggestions. It is pervaded by a deep religious tone; and no one who would begin each day with one of these selections, and heed its teaching, could fail to have their lives enriched and improved.

UNDER THE STABLE FLOOR. By M. Carrie Hyde. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 50 cents.—Small children will be fascinated by this story of the rats and mice who lived under the stable, and plotted and planned how to secure their share of the good things provided for the children who lived in the big house. Even the adventures of a small mouse may be thrilling, especially if one looks at them from his point of view. The story would have been more artistically carried out, had the writer kept closer within bounds as to the actual accomplishments of the four-footed band. Children are glad to believe in a wonder-world just out of sight, but it needs much care to intermingle it successfully with the one they live in.

NAUTILUS. By Laura E. Richards. Boston: Estes & Lauriat. 75 cents.—A pretty tale, for which the text should have been "A fairy ship a-sailing,

A-sailing on the sea;
And it was deeply laden
With pretty things for me."

An imaginative little boy, with a New England conscience, the dark-eyed skipper from the Bahamas, and a most villainous old miser are the chief figures of the story. As the title suggests, shells are the connecting link between these three oddly assorted characters. It makes an attractive gift-book, and will be welcomed by all who love New England fairy-tales.

JACK ALDEN. By Warren Lee Goss. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. $1.50.—This is the third of a series of historical stories of the war for the Union, based on actual experience in the Virginia campaigns. It will be found interesting, and it contains descriptions of such stirring events as the passage of the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment through Baltimore and the famous tunnel escape from Libby Prison. The account of the latter in veritable historical records is far more thrilling, however, than when woven into stories such as this. The spirit of the book is excellent, and the author confirms the truth of every description of battle scene or incident of army life.

THE MUSHROOM CAVE. By Evelyn Raymond. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.50.—These three hundred and fifty pages describe the ups and downs of a brother and sister, who are left alone in the world with the care of an aged grandfather. Devoted to scientific studies, the old gentleman has neither thought nor care for much else; and Gerald and Geraldine have need of all their bravery and brightness when they once realize the severe conditions forced on them. Their disappointments and successes in earning money and making friends combine into an interesting story, which might be improved by condensation, perhaps, in spite of its animation and various exciting incidents.

THE LONG VACATION. By Charlotte M. Yonge. New York & London: Macmillan & Co. $1.—Unless one is familiar with certain earlier stories of which this is a continuation, he must read far into the book before discovering the relative position of the characters, and understanding what it is all about. For "The Heir of Redclyffe's" sake, one likes to trace resemblances to it in these later books; but they lack its interest and unity, and one wearies inevitably of these incoherent conversations. If one has the patience to conquer these preliminary difficulties, the close will bring partial reward. It need not be said that the tone of the book is elevated, and that it presents a high ideal of home life.

STORIES AND POEMS FOR CHILDREN. By Celia Thaxter. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50.—The poppies on the cover and the shells and sea-birds would suggest Celia Thaxter, even if her name did not appear. For who else loved poppies and hollyhocks, kittens and kittiwakes, and everything living and growing as she did? The stories and poems were chiefly arranged for her grandchildren, who, under her influence, learned to love nature as she did. If this book could be used in the public schools, it would seem that it ought to result in less birds'-nesting and an earlier appreciation of the beauties of sea, sky, and flowers.

LOTTERY TICKET. By J. T. Trowbridge. Boston: Lee & Shepard, publishers, 10 Milk Street.—Mr. Trowbridge in this book has, with his well-known gifts, given us a true picture of life in some of its phases. It is the story of a boy who leaves his country home to engage in business in the city, where, under the fascination of a plausible and unscrupulous associate, he is induced to buy a lottery ticket. The various stages by which this lad, really honest at heart, is led into falsehood, are both graphically and vividly described. The book is interesting and thoroughly wholesome, and deserves a wide reading.

LITTLE MISS PHEBE GAY. By Helen Dawes Brown. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.—The mothers of little girls ought all to put this book on their list of Christmas presents immediately; for it is one that will not only delight the fortunate recipients with its natural, joyous stories of child life, but mothers, too, will enjoy the delicacy and refinement of its spirit, and laugh sympathetically over the amusing passages. Miss Brown sees things from the child's point of view, as any one must confess who has not forgotten similar experiences. Altogether, it is one of the best books for small girls that we have seen for a long time.

INMATES OF MY HOUSE AND GARDEN. By Mrs. Brightwen. Illustrated by Theo. Carreras. New York and London: Macmillan & Co.—Mrs. Brightwen has given us in this small volume another of her charming sketches of her pets. The previous ones have won the favor of the public, and the secret of her success is that she writes with knowledge gathered from first hand, and therefore speaks from experience, and not from hearsay. Moreover, she has an intense delight in the subject of which she writes. A book like this is valuable in many ways, and interesting to all the members of the household.

RUBY'S VACATION. By Minnie E. Paull. Boston: Estes & Lauriat.—This fourth volume of the "Ruby Series" will be found even more interesting by little girls than the earlier ones. How Ruby tried hard to overcome her faults of selfishness and self-conceit is told with real appreciation of the struggles of childhood. The story of Ruby's mishaps while visiting her grandmother will awaken the ardent sympathy of other little girls who find it equally hard to be quiet and good when there is "nothing to do." Ruby is certainly a more agreeable companion now than when we first made her acquaintance.

ZIGZAG JOURNEYS AROUND THE WORLD. By H. Butterworth. Estes & Lauriat. $2. Books like these of the "Zigzag Series," which have been before the public for fifteen years, are now so widely known that a new one requires only the merest announcement. The new volume of the present season describes a trip across the continent, visiting Niagara Falls, Chicago, Salt Lake City, and San Francisco, across the Pacific to Japan, China, and India, through Europe, visiting many of its principal points of interest, across the ocean to South America, thence home. There are over one hundred original illustrations.

MY HONEY. By the author of "Miss Toosey's Mission." Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.—This writer has put out two books for girls this season, both fresh and readable, bright in description and natural in conversation. "My Honey" is simpler in regard to plot than the other; but perhaps it is not less interesting, and its quiet pictures of English country life are refreshing after the excited scenes of other books which have lately appeared. This is a love story, of course, but free from sentimentalism and exaggeration; and mothers will enjoy reading it quite as much as their daughters.

FARRAR YEAR BOOK. Selections from the writings of Rev. Frederic W. Farrar, D.D., archdeacon and canon of Westminster. By W. M. L. Jay. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 11 West Twenty-third Street.—We have another evidence of the increase of books designed for private and family daily reading in the recent issue of selections from the writings of Archdeacon Farrar. These are made with care and discrimination, and are enriched by poetical quotations. The prose is an illustration of the variety and religious characteristics of this distinguished English Churchman.

WOMAN'S CAUSE. By Carol Norton. Christian Science Publishing Society.—The first twenty pages of this attractive little book are devoted to sketches of what noble women have accomplished in establishing goodness in the world. It is a worthy list of names that Mr. Norton presents to illustrate the belief that freedom granted to women means the purification of womanhood and the exaltation of manhood. The latter part of the book is devoted to a consideration and exaltation of the work of "Rev. Mary Baker Eddy, the Discoverer and Founder of Christian Science."

ABOUT MEN: WHAT WOMEN HAVE SAID. An Every-day Book. Chosen and arranged by Rose Porter. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—Long ago the philosopher Comte planned for the worship of women; but here we have a modern editor who arranges for the worship of men! With its unique form of daily quotations, it might make a good lover's vade mecum. Perhaps one had better not rely too much, however, on the opinions here expressed. The composite man of this year book is not a lovable person.

HILDEGARDE'S NEIGHBORS. By Laura E. Richards. Estes & Lauriat. $1.25.—This new volume in the "Hildegard Series" is likely to be as popular as its predecessors. There is no writer for children more generally enjoyed than is Mrs. Richards. Her humor is of the sort that appeals to children and grown people alike, and the natural charm of the boys and girls to whom she introduces us needs no sentimental or exaggerated incidents to give it effect.

UNDER THE OLD ELMS. By Mary B. Clafin. New York: T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.—A pleasant ramble does one take with Mrs. Clafin under the old elms on their beautiful Newtonville estate, in company with so many charming and distinguished people. One enjoys the society of Charles Sumner, Mrs. Stowe, Dr. Clarke, Mr.

The Wise Man of the Village

BY MARY E. WILKINS

The first of six striking types of a supposed New England village, showing Miss Wilkins at her best. In the Christmas issue of

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 Cents: For Sale Everywhere

The Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia

COPYRIGHT, 1895, BY THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

Whittier, and Dr. S. F. Smith, as well as of many less fortunate but equally appreciated guests at the hospitable mansion.

Miscellaneous.

“Our Mutual Friend,” just issued by Macmillan & Co., is a reprint of the edition corrected by the author in 1869, with an introduction, biographical and bibliographical, by Charles Dickens the younger. There are forty illustrations by Marcus Stone.

Thackeray’s “Novels by Eminent Hands” is reprinted in the dainty “Fly Leaves Series,” with rough, red leather binding, brightened by gold lettering. It hints unmistakably of Christmas possibilities, and its well-known humor and readability deserve remembrance in this form and at this time. It is issued by G. P. Putnam’s Sons.

The calendar recently issued by the Channing Auxiliary of San Francisco shows much patient care both in choice of selections and in illustrations. It is rather complicated in its suggestiveness, and ought to be studied with the accompanying leaflet in hand. It may be ordered from W. B. Clarke & Co. of this city.

Chatterbox for 1895 retains all the characteristics of its predecessors,—double columns, small but clear type, full-page woodcuts, and the usual number of stories, anecdotes, and short readable articles. The book is always a favorite with little children, who never weary of its pictures; and it will doubtless sell as readily as at any time in the quarter-century since Estes & Lauriat assumed the American copyright.

Among the Christmas books that seem especially worthy of mention is an attractive little story, “Round the Yule Log,” describing Christmas in Norway. It is both humorous and pathetic, and the holiday customs of the country are faithfully portrayed. P. Chr. Asbjørnsen is the writer, and he has found a sympathetic translator in H. L. Brockstad. The publishers are Estes & Lauriat, and the book is sold for 50 cents. It is so beautifully illustrated and bound that it will surely find ready welcome at this season of the year.

It is interesting, in these days of Mrs. Humphry Ward, Howells, Du Maurier, and Mr. James, to see the old novels rising from their graves, and stalking into the book-stores. Many of them are sure to be greeted with smiles and applause. Some of them never have really been buried, but have circulated with ghost-like quietness. And here comes “Jacob Faithful,” by Capt. Marryat, which Messrs. Macmillan & Co. have just issued, with illustrations by Henry M. Brock, and with an introduction by David Hannay. $1.25.

The publishing section of the American Library Association have printed a list of books for girls and women, with especial reference to the needs of clubs and classes. About twenty-one hundred books have been found worthy of place here, grouped in various departments, such as education, fiction, mythology, etc. These lists will be found nearly as useful for boys and men as for women. Notes indicate the chief value of many of the books, and there is no doubt about the usefulness of such lists. The selection of certain novels for recommendation might reasonably be questioned, considering the length of the list.

Messrs. Charles Scribner’s Sons have just issued, gathered up, and bound two sheaves of stories which ought to be garnered in many a library. One is “A Chosen Few Stories,” by Frank R. Stockton, which the author says were chosen by virtue of a sort of literary civil service examination, in order that they might be grouped together as a representative class of the author’s best known work in this line. We suspect that, for the most part, the public verdict will agree with Mr. Stockton’s. The preface gives a few hints of the circumstances under which they were composed. The other is “A Little Book of Profitable Tales,” by Eugene Field. It contains about twenty of what Mr. Field undoubtedly considered his best, from a money point of view, at any rate. Each volume is illustrated with a portrait of the author by W. H. W. Bicknell. $1.25.

Literary Notes.

Miss Alice C. Fletcher, who has lived among the Indians for some years, depicts a phase of life that has an historical interest, and that is fast passing away, in “Tribal Life among the Omahas,” to appear in the January Century.

Rudyard Kipling’s famous “Jungle Stories” had their origin in the suggestion of the editor of St. Nicholas that he try his hand at writing stories for the young readers of that magazine. This Mr. Kipling was the more ready to do, as he said he had “grown up on St. Nicholas.” He will write for it during the coming year.

An entirely new edition of the works of Lord Byron is announced by Macmillan &

For the PIANO Of a Religious Turn

“YOUNG PEOPLE’S CLASSICS.”

Although especially designed to meet the needs of young pupils for brightness, interest, and genuine musical excellence, this collection is recommended to players of all ages who can master only easy music, and yet desire something above the common popular airs. The volume has been received with great favor by both teachers and pupils. 51 pieces, 128 pages.

“YOUNG PEOPLE’S CLASSICS, No. 2.”

Issued in answer to the demand for a second volume of high grade juvenile compositions. Uniform with the above. 48 pieces, 128 pages.

“STUDENT’S CLASSICS.”

The 37 compositions in the book are from the best modern sources, and form a collection of rare excellence, variety, and interest. The pieces are of only moderate difficulty, being intended for the advanced pupil or the player of but medium skill. 143 pages.

“SELECTED CLASSICS.”

No pains have been spared to make this the finest collection of modern pianoforte pieces published. The authors represented hold highest rank among recent modern composers, and the compositions in the book are those which have excited most interest and praise in musical circles, during the past year or two. The music is not heavy nor too difficult for the ordinary player. 33 pieces, 143 pages.

“CLASSIC FOUR-HAND COLLECTION.”

The 19 four-hand compositions included in this volume have been selected for their combined attractiveness and musical excellence. Each duet is the work of one of the great modern composers, and the collection can be recommended as one of the most admirable of the kind ever published.

Each book is handsomely printed from specially engraved plates.

Each of the above Volumes. Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00. Postpaid.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N. Y.

“Mrs. Whitney is one of America’s best story-tellers. Her writings are pure, bright, entertaining, and improving,” says the Episcopal Register.

NOVELS AND STORIES

BY

MRS. A. D. T. WHITNEY

New Edition, with revisions. In seventeen volumes, in new and attractive binding.

Faith Gartney’s Girlhood
The Gayworthys

A Summer in Leslie Goldthwaite’s Life

We Girls: A Home Story

Sights and Insights (two volumes)

The Other Girls

Real Folks

Patience Strong’s Outings

Hitherto: A Story of Yesterdays

Boys at Chequasset

Odd, or Even?

Homespun Yarns. Short Stories

Bonnyborough

Mother Goose for Grown Folks

Ascotney Street

A Golden Gossip

$1.25 a vol.; the set, 17 vols. in a box, $21.25.

“Mrs. Whitney has succeeded in domesticating herself in a great number of American homes. The purity, sweetness, shrewdness, tenderness, humor, the elevated but still homely Christian faith which finds expression in her writings, endear her to thousands.”—E. P. Whipple.

Mrs. Whitney’s Poems

Daffodils. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Pansies. New Edition. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Holy-Tides. 16mo, paper covers, 75 cents.

Bird-Talk. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, $1.00.

White Memories. Portraits of Mr. Whittier, Bishop Brooks, and Miss Larcom. Square 8vo, $1.00.

“In her poetry as in her prose Mrs. Whitney is genuine and true to nature.”—Buffalo Courier.

Just How: A Key to the Cook-Books. A fine guide to wise and wholesome living. $1.00.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by
HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

THE YEAR BOOK

OF THE

Unitarian Congregational Churches

FOR 1896

will be published December 24, in season to reach those ordering it by the beginning of the new year, all lists being corrected as nearly as possible to that date.

Besides a calendar adapted for use throughout the country, and other matter belonging to an almanac, it contains lists of societies, ministers, associations, and conferences, and other important denominational information.

Price 20 cents, for which it will be sent to any address, postage paid. Packages of ten or more, 15 cents a copy. Members of the Association receive a copy without charge.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Joel: A Boy of Galilee

By ANNIE FELLOWS JOHNSTON. With 10 Illustrations by Victor A. Searles. Square 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

“It is reverent throughout, and in parts very tender and pathetic. The author has a decided gift for story-telling, and her bit of work is well done.”—N.Y. Herald.

“A very taking story, with a strong religious influence.”—Buffalo Commercial.

God’s Light as it Came to Me

16mo. Cloth. Antique paper. $1.00. It is full of beautiful and helpful ideas.

“Contains many suggestions of truth.”—Silver Cross.

From Jerusalem to Nicaea

The Church in the First Three Centuries. (Lowell lectures.) By PHILIP STAFFORD MOXOM, author of “The Aim of Life.” 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

“A simple history of that era, written in an unbiased manner. . . . Wonderfully fascinating, appealing almost equally to all cultivated men.”—N.Y. Times.

“Can be read with profit and interest by the entire reading public.”—Journal.

How We Rose

By DAVID NELSON BEACH. 16mo. Limp cover. 60 cents.

“Beautifully written.”—Baltimore American.

“Many interesting thoughts of work and progress in the future life.”—Churchman.

The Wedding Garment

A Tale of the Life to Come. By LOUIS PENDLETON. 16mo. Cloth, $1.00; white and gold, $1.25.

“The one grand practical lesson which this book teaches, and which is in accord with what the Divine Word and the New Church unfoldings of it everywhere teach, is the need of an interior, true purpose in life. The deepest ruling purpose which we cherish, what we constantly strive for and determine to pursue as the most real and precious thing of life, that rules us everywhere, that is our ego, our life, is what will have its way at last.”—From a Sermon by Rev. John Goddard of Cincinnati.

TENTH THOUSAND.

The World Beautiful

By LILIAN WHITING. 16mo. Cloth, $1.00; white and gold, $1.25.

“Such winning words of deep belief in the best which is accessible to all of us make friends of the reader at once; and he must be a rare person who does not lay down this unassuming volume with a feeling that he has been helped to live his life more generously and kindly than before.”—Literary World.

“Rarely does a book appear more rich in thought, suggestive, helpful, practical, unique, and forcible in its lessons for daily life.”—J. W. Chadwick.

At all Bookstores, or postpaid on receipt of price.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, Publishers
BOSTON, MASS.

For a CHRISTMAS GIFT

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

A Living Faith. By GEO. S. MERRIAM. 300 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co.’s HOLIDAY BOOKS.

A Victorian Anthology.

Selections illustrating the Editor’s critical review of British poetry in the reign of Victoria (“Victorian Poets”). Selected and edited by EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN. With brief biographies of the authors quoted, a fine frontispiece portrait of Queen Victoria, and a vignette of the Poets’ Corner in Westminster Abbey. Large crown 8vo, bound in attractive library style, $2.50; full gilt, $3.00; half calf, $4.50; full levant, $6.00. Large Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies, printed on paper of the best quality. 2 vols., 8vo, $10.00 net.

Mr. Stedman has availed himself of the vast range and richness of the field of poetry in Great Britain during the last sixty years to prepare a book of rare value and attractiveness. It is a companion volume to his critical work on “Victorian Poets.” Mr. Stedman has devoted to this work the same conscientious care which he bestows on his original volumes. The book is typographically beautiful, is printed on the best paper, and bound in a very attractive style.

Works of John Burroughs.

A beautiful edition of Mr. Burroughs’s writings in nine duodecimo volumes. Printed on cream-tinted laid paper, and bound in a simple but artistic style. With several portraits of Mr. Burroughs and engraved title-pages. Limited to 1,000 sets. Price, cloth, gilt top, $13.50, net, per set; cloth, paper label, untrimmed, $13.50, net; half calf, gilt top, $27.00, net.

Lovers of exquisitely made books and lovers of the very engaging volumes which we owe to the fine observation and the literary skill of Mr. Burroughs will heartily welcome this new edition which puts these treasures of literature into a form so artistic and every way attractive.

Mrs. Jameson’s Works on Art.

SACRED AND LEGENDARY ART, 2 vols.
LEGENDS OF THE MONASTIC ORDERS.
LEGENDS OF THE MADONNA.
MEMOIRS OF THE EARLY ITALIAN PAINTERS.
Edited by MISS ESTELLE M. HURLL, with a memoir and portrait of Mrs. Jameson. This will form a very beautiful and desirable edition of Mrs. Jameson’s Art Works. 5 vols. octavo, bound in simple but artistic style. Each volume contains nearly 100 illustrations, selected from the works of great masters. $3.00 each; the set, $15.00.

Standish of Standish.

By JANE G. AUSTIN, author of “A Nameless Nobleman,” “Betty Alden,” etc. With twenty full-page illustrations by FRANK T. MERRILL. Carefully printed, attractively bound. 2 vols., 12mo, gilt top, $5.00.

Mrs. Austin’s most popular novel of the Pilgrims of the Old Plymouth Colony has been illustrated with fine intelligence and exquisite skill by Mr. Merrill, and the two handsome volumes are every way beautiful and attractive.

Cambridge Poets.

Complete Poetical Works of
OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES,
H. W. LONGFELLOW,
JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Beautiful volumes, each with a portrait, a vignette, biographical sketch, notes, chronological tables, indexes of titles and first lines. Each large crown 8vo, $2.00; half calf, gilt top, $3.50; full levant, $5.50.

Letters of Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

By ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. With 16 portraits and other illustrations. 2 vols., 8vo, gilt top, $6.00; half calf, $10.50.

The Critic of New York says that “no student of Coleridge or of the romantic period can afford to be without this book.”

Letters of Celia Thaxter.

A memorial of the life Mrs. Thaxter led on Appledore in the charming island garden which she created, and also in the delightful visits with which she gladdened her friends. Edited by A. F. and R. L. With three portraits. 12mo, gilt top, $1.50.

Townsend Harris, First American Envoy in Japan.

By WILLIAM E. GRIFFIS, D.D., author of “Japan: In History, Folk-lore, and Art,” “The Lily among Thorns,” “Brave Little Holland,” etc. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

“To read it is to gain a fresh zest for Japanese affairs, and to become informed concerning the important events during a long chapter of Japanese history heretofore lacking.”—New York Observer.

Sold by booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by
HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage’s letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Co. It will be edited by Mr. W. E. Henley, and will include, besides the complete poetical works, the letters of Byron, public and private, which, with their spirit and ease and charm, are usually admitted to be among the best of English letters.

The volume of stories by Edward William Thomson is receiving the praise its unusual merit deserves. A. T. Quiller-Couch, writing in the London Speaker, calls attention to "The Ride by Night" as a good, galloping narrative that stirs the blood like a ballad, and declares it to be one of the best rides in fiction, poetry or prose.

The Jewish Publication Society offers a prize of $1,000 for the best story relating to a Jewish subject for young readers. The story must be in English, of not less than twenty thousand words, and not more than thirty thousand; and manuscripts must be in the society's hands by March 1, 1897. Miss Henrietta Szold is the secretary, 702 West Lombard Street, Baltimore.

The Fly Leaf is the name of another little magazine of the "Chap Book" order, hailing from Boston, and gotten up in an attractive form. It is conducted by Walter Blackburn Harte, a writer whose work is well known to readers of current literature; and it is devoted to the new,—to new men, new women, new ideas, whimsies, and things.

Mr. J. W. Bengough, whose fame as a caricaturist and humorist is wide-spread throughout the United States and Canada, has introduced something new in the way of book-making which will carry laughter and instruction wherever the new book goes, "The Up-to-date Primer: A First Book of Lessons for Little Political Economists." It is composed of words of one syllable, with pictures, and is an amusing travesty on the child's primer in use in the public schools. The series of lessons presents a complete exposition of the theory taught in the works of Henry George,—notably, a very clear conception of the idea promulgated in his "Progress and Poverty," a book which many fail to clearly understand. It is claimed that no person can read this primer and not thoroughly understand the whole matter. It will be sold at 25 cents per copy. The Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York, are the publishers.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. Silas Marner, the Weaver of Raveloe. By George Eliot. With an Introduction. Tom Brown's School-days by an Old Boy. By Thomas Hughes. With an Introductory Sketch. Two Years before the Mast. A Personal Narrative. By Richard Henry Dana, Jr. With a Supplement by the author and a Biographical Sketch.

From D. C. Heath & Co., Boston. Selections for French Composition. By C. H. Grandgent, Director of Modern Language Instruction in the Boston Public Schools.

From Lee & Shepard, Boston. Essie. A Romance in Rhyme. By Laura Dayton Fessenden. Illustrated by J. H. Vanderpoel. Price $1.50. Old Boston Reproductions of Etchings in Half-tone. Etchings and text by Henry R. Blaney. Price $1.00. The Boston Charades. By Herbert Ingalls. Price $1.00. The Boy Officers of 1812. By Everett T. Tomlinson. Price $1.50.

From Alice Reynolds Keyes, Concord, Mass. A Collection of Historical and Other Papers. By Rev. Grindall Reynolds, D.D., to which are added seven of his Sermons. Edited by Alice Reynolds Keyes.

From the American Book Company, New York. Stories of Great Americans for Little Americans. Second Reader grade. By Edward Eggleston. Price 40 cents. The Vicar of Wakefield. By Oliver Goldsmith. Price 35 cents. The Comedy of "As You Like It." By William Shakespeare. Price 20 cents. Third Reader grade. By Edward Eggleston. Price 50 cents. Elementary Lessons in Zoology. A Guide in Studying Animal Life and Structure in Field and Laboratory. By James G. Needham, M.S. Price 90 cents. Zoology for High Schools and Academies. By Margaretta Burnet, Teacher of Biology, Woodward High School, Cincinnati. Price 75 cents.

From Macmillan & Co., New York. The Brown Ambassador. A Story of the Three Days' Moon. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. Price $1.25. Stories from English History from Richard II. to Charles I. By Rev. A. J. Church, M.A. With many illustrations. Price $1.00. Heredity and Christian Problems. By Amory H. Bradford. Price $1.50. The Place and the People. By Grace Kline. With illustrations by Frances E. Jones. Price $2.50.

From E. P. Dutton & Co., New York. Sermons for the Principal Festivals and Fasts of the Church Year. By the Rt. Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D. Edited by Rev. John Cotton Brooks. Seventh series. Price $1.75.

From Harper & Brothers, New York. Methods of Mind-training, Concentrated Attention, and Memory. By Catharine Aiken. The Journal of a Spy in Paris during the Reign of Terror, January to July, 1794. By Raoul Hasdin. 'Cension. A Sketch from Paso del Norte. By Maude Mason Austin. Illustrated.

From the Century Company, New York. Illustrated Monthly Magazine from May, 1895, to October, 1895. St. Nicholas. An Illustrated Magazine for Young Folks. Conducted by Mary Mapes Dodge. Vol. XXII, Part I, November, 1894, to April, 1895. Part II, May, 1895, to October, 1895.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. The Babe of Bethlehem. Song for Tenor or Soprano voice. Words by J. G. Holland. Music by Smith N. Penfield. One Quiet Night. Christmas Song. Alto or Baritone, in E-flat. Words and music by Bardsley Van de Water. Steadfast, my Heart. Alto or Baritone, in E-flat. Words by Samuel G. Young. Music by James B. Goe. In my Dreams I see him. Song and Chorus. Words and music by H. A. Shualess. La Pollette. Waltz. Composed for Mandolin and Guitar. By C. de Janon. Polsson d'Avril. For the Pianoforte. Designed especially for teaching purposes. By Fred L. Morey. Dancing by the Brookside. Moreau Characteristique. For Pianoforte. By J. J. Gallaher. Mon Chéri. Valse Mignonne. By Charles Becker.

BOOKS THAT WILL DELIGHT LITTLE CHILDREN

The following list is of books with movable pictures made for Little Children. We shall be pleased to have them examined by the children themselves.

The Model Menagerie. A novelty color book which shows pictures of animals in cages. Size 10 x 13..... $2.50

Our Darling's Surprise Pictures. Large 4to (10 x 13), 16 movable colored pictures, with rhymes, by Fred E. Weatherly.... 2.00

Touch and Go. Large 4to (10 x 13), 16 movable colored pictures, with rhymes, by Fred E. Weatherly.... 2.00

Panorama Pictures. A new mechanical color book, containing 5 cut-out pictures and 24 type pages, large 4to (11 x 13)..... 2.00

Revolving Pictures. An entire novelty. All the pictures revolve, one sliding off and showing the next. Size 11½ x 10..... 2.00

Vanishing Pictures. An entire novelty of revolving pictures. Size 9 x 7¾..... 1.25

Transformation Pictures and Comical Fixtures. A book of transformation pictures. 4to (7 x 7¾). Boards..... .75

The Rabbit Witch

And Other Tales. By KATHARINE PYLE. Oblong, 6½ x 9½, over 100 Illustrations. Cloth, $1.50.

"A book that will delight the little ones, with a series of funny pictures, accompanied with rhymes just as funny and yet carrying lessons with them which cannot help being of service."—Boston Evening Transcript.

"The children will vote the work very funny and delightful."—N. Y. Observer.

"Just such a book for youngsters as we all search for when we want to bestow a gift-book that will entertain and amuse."—N. Y. Home Journal.

"An oddly attractive book."—Boston Beacon.

Jacob and the Raven

With Other Stories for Children. By FRANCES M. PEARD. Illustrated by Heywood Sumner. 1 vol., large 12mo, bound in silk, $1.50.

"Will be heartily welcomed by the little ones, who will find in it abundant source of entertainment. Miss Peard's stories, which are perhaps better known in England than in this country, are among the best of their kind; and we are glad to see that American children are now to have an opportunity to enjoy them."—Boston Evening Transcript.

Sweet Content.

By Mrs. MOLESWORTH. A new edition of this popular story book. 4to, 184 pages, illustrated full gilt, $1.50.

Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of prices.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., PUBLISHERS,

31 West 23d Street, - - - New York.

Meadow=Grass

By ALICE BROWN.

Tales of New England Life. Cloth, octavo, $1.50.

What Mr. Howells says:

"Miss Alice Brown is of that New England group of noveletists, mainly women, which is perhaps larger than any like group outside of New England. The names of Miss Jewett, Miss Wilkins, Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggin, Mrs. Chace-Wyman, will sufficiently suggest it, but by no means fully represent it; and it is praising Miss Brown very highly to say that she is worthy of that company of instinctive and instructed artists. . . . I recognized with surprise as well as pleasure the novelty of this new-comer's material. Her touch has an originality as delightful, and altogether we can be glad of her book, in the right New England way, with a good conscience. The conditions and the physiognomies she studies are much the same that all those writers deal with, but the atmosphere is less bleak than in Mrs. Wyman's page, the humor is a middle note between that of Mrs. Wiggin's laugh and Miss Jewett's smile, and the figures have a softer outline than Miss Wilkins's people. These writers all remind you of one another at times; at other times each is strictly and unother as she likes; and it is to be said of Miss Brown that she is like the rest in both respects."—W. D. Howells, in Harper's Weekly.

"The simple villagers are pictured with a graphic skill that is not excelled by any contemporary writer of New England tales. In pathos and in humor Miss Brown is equally successful. The story of Heman Blaisdell's persecution and his deliverance, and that of old Lady Lamson's holiday, are as good as many of Miss Jewett's. The last is worthy of comparison with 'The Passing of Sister Bassett.'"—New York Times.

"It is a pleasure to find in these simple tales the evidence of kindly interests and a very sympathetic rendering of the lives of our country people."—The Springfield Republican.

ARABELLA AND ARAMINTA STORIES.

By GERTRUDE SMITH. With an Introduction in Verse by Mary E. Wilkins, and Fifteen Full-page Pictures by Ethel Reed. Large square octavo, with ornamental cover and end papers, $2.00.

The most astonishing book of children's nonsense which has been thought of since Edward Lear brought out his charming volume twenty years ago.

COPELAND & DAY, BOSTON.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT in NEW YORK With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs. Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott. A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. 56th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed this book." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. We Pay Freights to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and to Free Outlets. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

New Book Bulletin

Old Boston

REPRODUCTIONS OF ETCHINGS IN HALF-TONES. OLD BOSTON BUILDINGS WITH DESCRIPTIVE TEXT. By HENRY R. BLANEY. Size 7½ x 9½. Cloth, gilt edges. Boxed, $2.50

By the author of "A Hillop Summer."

Aunt Billy

By ALYN YATES KEITH, author of "A Spinster's Leaflets." Cloth, $1.25.

Broken Notes

By Mrs. J. S. HALLOCK. Illustrated with half-tone vignettes. Cloth, $1.25.

Essie

A Romance in Rhyme. By LAURA DAYTON FESSENDEN. Illustrated by J. H. VANDERPOEL. Cloth, $1.50.

Whiffs from Wild Meadows

By SAM WALTER FOSS, author of "Back Country Poems." With Forty Illustrations. Cloth, gilt top, $1.50.

"For Sweetheart or Friend."

Because I Love You

A Choice Collection of Love Poems. Edited by ANNA E. MACK. New Edition. Cloth, white and gold. Boxed, price $1.50.

ALL OVER THE WORLD LIBRARY.

Third Series.

Half round the World; or, Among the Uncivilized.

By OLIVER OPTIC. Cloth. Illustrated. Price $1.25. Uniform with Across India; or, Live Boys in the Far East.

By OLIVER OPTIC. Illustrated. $1.25.

By the author of "Little Prudy"

Kyzie Dunlee: A Golden Girl

By SOPHIE MAY. Illustrated. Price 75 cents. Uniform with Little Prudy's Children

By SOPHIE MAY. WEE LUCY, JIMMY BOY, KYZIE DUNLEE. Three volumes. Illustrated. Boxed, price 75 cents per volume.

Our Illustrated Catalogue Mailed Free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, BOSTON.

Some of our Latest Books

The Leisure of God,

And Other Studies in the Spiritual Evolution. By JOHN COLEMAN ADAMS, D.D. 12mo, 233 pages, $1.00.

The Church and Secular Life.

By Rev. F. W. HAMILTON. 12mo, 225 pages, 75 cents.

The Saviour of the World.

No. 7 of "Manuals of Faith and Duty." By CHARLES ELLWOOD NASH, D.D. 16mo, 105 pages. Net, 25 cents.

Wayside and Fireside Rambles.

Sketches, Reminiscences, and Confessions. By ALMON GUNNISON, D.D. With illustrations by Remington and Gibson. 12mo, 241 pages, $1.25.

The Purpose of God.

By JOSEPH SMITH DODGE, A.M., D.D. 12mo, 265 pages. Net, 75 cents.

Church Harmonies: New and Old.

A Book of Spiritual Song for Christian Worshippers.

Ranks with the best modern Hymnals in scope, variety, typography, availability.

Send for descriptive circular and sample pages.

Prices to Societies:

Cloth, 408 pp., $1.00 | With Psalms & Chants, 456 pp., $1.10
Half Leather, 1 15 | do do 1.25

Universalist Publishing House,

BOSTON: 30 West Street. CHICAGO: 69 Dearborn Street.

Children's Favorite Classics.

Few books written for young people possess greater merit or have had a wider popularity than the volumes in this series.

Fully illustrated. Colored frontispiece. Cloth back, fancy paper sides, 16mo. Each 75 cents. 8vo edition, with colored borders, attractively bound in white and colors. Each $1.25.

Alice's Adventures in Wonderland
Through the Looking-glass
Jackanapes and Daddy Darwin
The Story of a Short Life
Lob Lie by the Fire
The Little Lame Prince
The Adventures of a Brownie
The Peep of Day
Black Beauty
Carrots
Cuckoo Clock
Water Babies

Descriptive catalogue sent on application.

T. Y. CROWELL & CO., New York and Boston.

Charles Scribner's Sons' New Juveniles

TWO LITTLE PILGRIMS' PROGRESS

A Story of the City Beautiful. By Mrs. FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. Illustrated by R. B. Birch. Square 8vo, uniform with "Fauntleroy." $1.50.

Mrs. MARGARET E. SANGSTER writes: "The day we first read it will stand ever after among the red-letter days of life. It is a story to be marked with a white stone, a strong, sweet, true book, touching the high-water mark of excellence."

THE GARDEN BEHIND THE MOON

A Real Story of the Moon Angel. Written and illustrated by HOWARD PYLE. Square 12mo, $2.00.

"His new story is one of his best, and his new book a beautiful one."—Boston Advertiser.

"So far as daintiness, lightness, and fantasy are concerned, Mr. Pyle has surpassed himself. It is admirably illustrated."—N. Y. Evening Sun.

THREE NEW BOOKS BY

G. A. HENTY

A Knight of the White Cross. A Tale of the Siege of Rhodes.

The Tiger of Mysore. A Story of the War with Tippoo Saib.

Through Russian Snows. A Story of Napoleon's Retreat from Moscow.

Each crown 8vo, illustrated, $1.50.

"They are all in Mr. Henty's clever style, and with striking illustrations."—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

THE KANTER GIRLS

By MARY L. B. BRANCH. Illustrated by Helen M. Armstrong. Square 12mo, $1.50.

HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD writes, "It is a delightful book, and takes rank with 'Alice in Wonderland,' I think, with a little finer strain of imagination in its favor."

CHILDREN'S STORIES IN AMERICAN LITERATURE

By HENRIETTA CHRISTIAN WRIGHT. 12mo, $1.25.

"Comprehensive, rich in information, and delightfully attractive in its presentation of the personality and performances of American authors."—Boston Beacon.

AT WAR WITH PONTIAC

Or, The Totem of the Bear. A Tale of Redcoat and Redskin. By KIRK MUNROE. Illustrated, $1.25.

"A fascinating book for boys, full of action and movement."—N. Y. Observer.

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES

By R. L. STEVENSON. New edition, illustrated, $1.50.

"A dainty volume, crowded with gems."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

FOR LIFE AND LIBERTY

A Story of Battle by Land and Sea. By GORDON STABLES. Illustrated, 12mo, $1.50.

JOSEPH THE DREAMER

By the author of "Jesus the Carpenter." 12mo, $1.50.

A popular story of Joseph's life, and a graphic picture of the period in which he lived.

Scribner's Illustrated List of Books for the Young will be sent to any address on application.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
153-157 Fifth Avenue, New York

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

THE VOICE OF THE HELPLESS.

I hear a wail from the woodland,
A cry from the forests dim;
A sound of woe from the sweet hedgerow,
From the willows and reeds that rim
The sedgy pools; from the meadow grass
I hear the fitful cry, alas!

It drowns the throb of music,
The laughter of childhood sweet;
It seems to rise to the very skies,
As I walk the crowded street;
When I wait on God in the house of prayer,
I hear the sad wail even there.

'Tis the cry of the orphaned nestlings,
'Tis the wail of the bird that sings
His song of grace in the archer's face,
'Tis the flutter of broken wings,
'Tis the voice of helplessness,—the cry
Of many a woodland tragedy.

O lovely, unthinking maiden,
The wing that adorns your hat
Has the radiance rare that God placed there;
But I see in place of that
A mockery, pitiful, deep, and sad,
Of all things happy and gay and glad.

O mother, you clasp your darling
Close to your loving breast;
Think of that other, that tender mother,
Brooding upon her nest!
In the little chirp from the field and wood
Does no sound touch your motherhood?

That little dead bird on your bonnet,
Is it worth the cruel wrong?
The beauty you wear so proudly there
Is the price of a silenced song:
The humming-bird on your velvet dress
Mocks your womanly tenderness.

I hear a cry from the woodland,
A voice from the forests dim;
A sound of woe from the sweet hedgerow,
From the willows and reeds that rim
The sedgy pool; from the meadow grass
I hear the pitiful sound, alas!

Can you not hear it, my sister,
Above the heartless behest
Of fashion that stands, with cruel hands,
Despoiling the songful nest?
Above that voice have you never heard
The voice of the helpless, hunted bird?

—Carlotta Perry.

THAT MISS BENTON.

"I have some bad news for you, girls. Don't call me an eavesdropper, unless it is in the sense of dropping from the eaves. If our genial host, Mr. Tuttle, persists in holding his domestic conferences beneath my window, in the tone he uses to his oxen, on a subject intimately related to my peace and welfare, I consider myself justified in listening."

When she had made this speech, Lou Saxe dropped on the bed, already occupied by Bertha Lewis and Jeanie Foster, in an attitude of mock despair.

"What has happened?" asked Pris Armstrong, whose room they were in. She was at the bureau, where she was trying to heat a curling-iron over the flickering flame of a small lamp.

"Some one is coming to-night to take the corner room," answered Lou. "She is an invalid,—at least, Mr. Tuttle said she was 'coming for the quiet'; and nobody but a sick person wants to be quiet, of course."

"Ah!" remarked Pris, after an ominous pause.

"This means," went on Lou, "that we must give up our evening kettledrums in your room; for, when the invalid goes to bed, she will want to go to sleep. We must not sing when we come home from a hay-ride or dance down the corridor after we have retired for the night. Neither must we gather here for midnight ghost stories, because an invalid can hear every whisper."

"It is too bad that she should come here to spoil our good times!" said Pris, indignantly. "Sick people should stay at home!"

"I know all about the way a person who has nervous prostration behaves, because my Aunt Kathleen had it," went on Lou. "Would you believe it, girls, she could not bear to see the dog wag his tail, and she put her hands to her ears if he threatened to bark. She did not like to have any one eat toast, because the crunching affected her nerves; and, if I sat down in front of her in a rocking-chair, she would beg me to stop rocking, for the motion made her so nervous!"

"Mere affectation!" exclaimed Pris. "If people let such notions take possession of them, there is no knowing to what extremes they may be led, like the nuns in the Middle Ages, who had a nervous epidemic of barking. I really think we have a mission work to perform, girls, in the midst of our good times."

"Aunt Kathleen didn't like clocks, either," pursued Lou. "Her power of hearing them tick was simply supernatural. Her room was at the top of the house, but she could hear the clock in the dining-room. She said she should like to emigrate to the village in South America that Darwin tells about, where there was not a single clock or watch, but the hours were guessed at by an old man 'who had a good idea of time.'"

"It is clearly our duty to keep our neighbor from developing into a hypochondriac, like your amiable relative," said Pris, decisively. "She should not come to a summer hotel for quiet. We are here to have a good time, and not to look after invalids!"

The gong sounded, and the girls scattered to their rooms. Later they gathered on the piazza to watch the arrivals.

"That is she!" whispered Lou, as a round-faced, dark-eyed young woman came up the steps.

"But she doesn't look like an invalid," demurred Jeanie.

"They never do! Nervous invalids always look the picture of health," returned Lou. "That is one way you can tell them. Another way is by their bags, to which they cling as to dear life. These bags contain little pellets, or a bottle of caffeine-bromine, or a treatise on how to cure nervousness, according to the mental endowments or disendowments of the owner."

Miss Benton—as the name of the new guest read simply on the register—retired early; but a light gleaming beneath her door showed that she was still awake when the girls assembled in Pris's room to exchange their gossip. Pris had dragged the rocking-chairs from the other apartments into her own chamber, and they began their discipline of their unwelcome neighbor by a series of thumps. The door was left open. A small, round clock having wonderful ticking powers was placed in the entry.

If the four girls, after this, could appear at the breakfast-table looking as fresh as though they had gone to bed with the sun, such was not the case with their neighbor. Miss Benton's heavy eyes and languid manner bore witness to a disturbed night.

The people in the smaller dining-room, having come early in the season, had fallen into the pleasant intimacy for which even a few weeks together in a summer hotel are sufficient. Miss Benton made no attempt to join in the merry, desultory chatter, which was, indeed, skilfully directed by Pris to the end of excluding her. What had begun in a mere spirit of frolic and a passing resentment developed, as the days went on, into scarcely concealed dislike, the reason for which none could have told. There was certainly no apparent reason, for Miss Benton was well-bred and attractive in appearance.

Even gentle Mrs. Forsythe, who had hitherto welcomed so kindly any solitary stranger, was swept along by the current, and save for a stately inclination of her head and a formal greeting ignored Miss Benton. She was very fond of her niece, Lou Saxe, and "A summer hotel was not a hospital," she said.

So in the picnic at the Rapids, during the long, bright day spent at the Shaker settlement, and at the climb up Saddleback, Miss Benton was ignored. She was not invited to join in the evening games, in which even the elders participated; nor did any one suggest that she was included in the bidding to the hop at a neighboring hotel, or to the concert given in the village by the summer residents.

The next festivity was a "lawn party," given by an enterprising youth in the near neighborhood, who, in the hope of remuneration, had showered his rustic attentions upon the city visitors. The saw-mill of which he was the owner stood on the brink of a great, dark pool, that had been named by the girls the Styx. Mark Mudgett was his name; and "Mark" was an abbreviation of "Marquis de Lafayette," a given name originally bestowed under the impression that the French patriot's title was a Christian name. The girls politely called him "the Marquis."

Ice-cream was to be sold at his lawn party, and boats were to be let on the Styx. The girls had enlisted the interest of the other hotels, and the Marquis fête was a great success.

The girls all enjoyed it much; but the crowning festivity, the last frolic of the season, had been reserved for the following day. There was to be a twenty-mile drive to the lake, a sail around it, and a moonlight drive home.

Early on the morning following the Marquis's lawn party Lou entered Pris's room to find her friend, with a ghastly face, seated upon the side of the bed.

"It was the ice-cream!" Pris gasped. "Oh, dear! Is this the way it feels to be sick?"

Poor Pris clasped the bed-post with both hands, as though she could thereby stop the dizzy whirl in her aching head. The other girls came in, and suggested various unsuitable remedies.

"Leave me! I don't care if I die! I'd rather die than feel like this! I heard the clock strike every hour till four,—think of it, girls! And then, just as I began to feel sleepy, the cows commenced to low, and Mr. Tuttle began his usual conference through the kitchen window."

Mrs. Forsythe was called. The remedy for a sick headache, she declared, was to lie abed all day in a darkened room; and to that treatment Pris was condemned.

"Please go," she said, when Mrs. Forsythe wished to give up the proposed expedition. "You can do nothing by remaining, and I do not want to feel that I have robbed you of a day's pleasure."

"You will be quite alone. Every one is going but Mrs. Tuttle and that Miss Benton," urged Mrs. Forsythe.

"I don't want to talk. I am going to sleep all day." The other girls, with noisy sympathy, yielded commiseratingly to Pris's command that the expedition should not be given up.

Presently she heard the groaning wheels of the mountain wagon roll up to the door. One horse was restive. Would he neigh again? The girl put her hands to her ears in an agony of apprehension. What a shrill voice Lou Saxe had, and how long they were getting ready!

They were gone at last, and the girl turned her pillow to see if there were not a cool spot upon it; but no sleep came. The day was intensely hot. She had closed the window to shut out the sound of Mrs. Tuttle, the hostess, beating eggs in the kitchen. Her sense of hearing was a torture to her.

By and by Mrs. Tuttle came to the room, seated herself in the rocking-chair,—the one that had been utilized in Miss Benton's treatment,—and entertained the invalid with a graphic account of all the funerals, accidents, and illnesses that had come under her observation.

"Seems as though you'd ought to have something for dinner," she urged. "Couldn't you eat a bit o' cheese?"

"No, thank you," answered Pris, struggling to speak gently.

"It's home-made. 'Twouldn't hurt you."

"But I don't care for any, thank you."

"Jest a grain. You could soak it in your tea."

"Please, no!" murmured Pris.

"If you soak it in your tea, it would make it soft."

Pris's self-control was at an end. Desperation gave momentary strength. "I—don't—want—any cheese!" she cried fiercely. "I never mean to eat anything again as long as I live. Do go!"

Mrs. Tuttle moved toward the door in evident alarm. With her hand on the knob, she hesitated and turned, with a feeling akin to that of the deserter condemned to be shot and expectant of the word of command, "Fire!" Pris dived beneath the bedclothes. The next moment the bang of the door quivered through and through her aching head.

How the hours dragged! In the silence of the great house a creeping sense of loneliness came over the girl, till it amounted almost to terror.

"If I live to get home, I'll never leave it again," she thought. "How do you do?"

The last words were spoken aloud, in sudden frenzied desire to hear a human voice, and to ascertain whether she had not lost the power of speech.

"Not at all well, thank you," she answered herself, still aloud. "I am in a position to realize, as I never did before, the figures given in the arithmetic, beneath the 'Table of Time Measure,' of the appalling number of seconds there are in a day!"

Presently there was a gentle tap at the door.

"Come in!" called Pris, ready to welcome even Mrs. Tuttle. But it was Miss Benton who stood upon the threshold!

"I thought I heard you speak," said Miss Benton. "Can I do anything for you?"

It was more in the tone than even the kindly words; but the last vestige of Pris's self-control vanished, and an incoherent outburst was the only answer. Miss Benton listened at first in astonishment, and finally with a look of understanding; while her mouth, which Pris noticed for the first time was so fine and true, lost its smiling curves. But, in the gravity that had stolen over the face, the girl was vaguely aware that a rare depth of feeling was revealed.

"Oh, it is awful to think of the way we have treated you!" Pris concluded, breathlessly.

The smile came back for a moment to Miss Benton's face.

"This is the first I have known of my ill-treatment," she said calmly. "I should have gone home to-morrow under the impression that this was a remarkably agreeable household. I have been so unutterably thankful that you let me alone, did not force me to 'talk shop,' ask for my autograph, inquire if it were not necessary for me to 'keep my mind calm,'—a query with which one poor unfortunate agonized me at Scranton,—and, above all, did not allude to me as an 'authoress'!"

"An authoress!" repeated Pris, in a dazed tone. "You are not—you cannot be Kate Eleanor Benton? Why, yes, you are the Miss Benton!"

Oh, the difference conveyed in a girl's tone between "the Miss Benton" and "that Miss Benton!"

"Please!" The owner of the name made a funny little gesture of abhorrence. "That word—'authoress'—always conveys to my mind an impression of a being with long curls, who writes verses for the 'Poets' Corner' of the local newspaper. You see," she went on, in a communicative tone,—for Pris was too much overwhelmed for speech at the discovery that the occupant of the corner room was a woman whose name was a household word wherever there were girls to read and love her stories,—"I had work that I must finish, and at Scranton I was not left in peace for a moment. So I stuffed my manuscript into my bag, and fled. I could devote myself to my work here without one ear pricked up for fear of interruption. It was so delightfully quiet in my room!"

"Quiet!" interrupted Pris, in amazement.

"Wasn't it?" queried Miss Benton, innocently. "But I acknowledge that I am deaf, dumb, and blind when I am at work on the last pages of a story. I did hear your good times together, though, after you came upstairs for the night, and sometimes longed to join you. Your extempore orchestra of whistling and blowing on combs was my evening refreshment."

"We wouldn't have done it for the world if we had known," murmured Pris, abjectly.

A Good Almanac

is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

The Sunlight Almanac

for 1896 contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free

to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them.

Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents.

A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 830).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Bldg., N. Y.

"I am a disappointment, of course," returned Miss Benton, laughing. "Confess that you thought an authoress must be seven feet tall, with a dictionary under one arm, an encyclopædia under the other, goggles on her nose, and a pen in her hand! I'm sorry you're ill. I will have your floor and mine open, so you shall not feel lonesome; and perhaps you can sleep. Oh, no, don't thank me just for being neighborly."

A crowd was gathered around Miss Benton the next morning, and a chorus of lamentation arose that she was going by the morning train.

"This is what I have escaped!" she exclaimed, in mock despair, as autograph fans and albums were produced by the adoring circle of girls.

In one album there was written a line that, as Pris Armstrong, who felt quite well the next day, looked upon it, choked back her "Thank you,"—

"I was a stranger, and ye took me not in!"—Edith Robinson, in Youth's Companion.

For the Christian Register.

TOMMY'S PROCESSION.

BY R. P. U.

It was the children's hour,—the time for bed-time stories and chat. Tommy sat in his mother's lap, white-robed, ready for bed. The air that floated in through the open window was the very breath of summer, and the only light in the room was that which came from the young moon. It filtered through the maple-trees, resting on Tommy's yellow curls, and making shadows of leaves and branches on the floor. There was no sound of breeze or bird. Even Tommy's industrious little tongue was resting from its labors; and his mother's thoughts, which had for the moment wandered far away, came suddenly back to wonder at the silence, and to question what Tommy might be thinking about.

She was not long left in doubt. "Mamma," said Tommy, in a slow, mysterious half-whisper, "s'posin' right now, when it's all still and half dark, and there's nobody left but you and me, all of a sudden, walking slowly down the street, a great, big, huge mastodon should come, and after him an elephant, and after him a rhinoceros, and then a giraffe, and then a unicorn, and then a zebra, and then a gorilla, and then a kangaroo, and then a bear, and then a lion, and then a tiger, and then a wolf, and then a squirrel, and then a thousand miles of crabs! Wouldn't you be surprised?"

"I certainly should," said his mother. "I should be so astonished I should not know what to say or do."

"I shouldn't," said Tommy. "Maybe it will happen so some night when it's very still, and nobody's looking but you and me."

A STORY OF LINCOLN.

Public interest in the deeds and words of Abraham Lincoln seems to increase as the years come and go. Mr. Speed, of Kentucky, has been giving McClure's Magazine some personal reminiscences which have never before appeared in print. This selection will be read with interest:—

The last time I saw him was about two weeks before his assassination. He sent me word by my brother James, then in his cabinet, that he desired to see me before I went home. I went into his office about eleven o'clock. He looked jaded and weary. I stayed in the room until his hour for callers was over. He ordered the door closed, and, looking over to where I was sitting, asked me to draw up my chair. But instead of being alone, as he supposed, in the opposite direction from where I sat, and across the fireplace from him, sat two humb e-looking women. Seeing them there seemed to provoke him; and he said, "Well, ladies, what can I do for you?" One was an old woman, the other young. They both commenced talking at once. The President soon comprehended them. "I suppose," said he, "that your son and your husband are in prison for resisting the draft in Western Pennsylvania. Where is your petition?"

The old lady replied: "Mr. Lincoln, I have no petition. I went to a lawyer to get one drawn; and I had not the money to pay him, and come here, too. So I thought I would just come and ask you to let me have my boy."

"And it is your husband you want?" said he, turning to the young woman.

"Yes," said she. He rang the bell, and called his servant, and bade him to go and tell Gen. Dana to bring him the list of prisoners for resisting the draft in Western Pennsylvania.

The general soon came, bringing a package of papers. The President opened it, and, counting the names, said: "General, there are twenty-seven of these men. Is there any difference in the degree of their guilt?"

"No," said the general: "it's a bad case and a merciful finding."

"Well," said the Pre-ident, looking out of the window, and seemingly talking to himself, "these poor fellows have, I think, suffered enough. They have been in prison fifteen months. I have been thinking so for some time, and have said so to Stanton; and he always threatened to resign if they were released. But he has said so about other matters, and never did it. So now, while I have the paper in my hand, I will turn out the flock." So he wrote, "Let the prisoners named in the within page be discharged," and signed it. The general made his bow, and left. Then, turning to the ladies, he said: "Now, ladies, you can go. Your son, madam, and your husband, madam, is free."

The young woman ran across to him, and began to kneel. He took her by the elbow, and said impatiently, "Get up, get up, none of this!" But the old woman walked to him, wiping with her apron the tears that were coursing down her cheeks. She gave him her hand, and, looking into his face, said: "Good-by, Mr. Lincoln. We will never meet again till we meet in heaven."

A change came over his sad and weary face. He clasped her hand in both of his, and followed her to the door, saying as he went, "With all I have to cross me here I am afraid I will never get there, but your wish that you will meet me there has fully paid me for all I have done for you."

We were then alone. He drew his chair to the fire, and said: "Speed, I am a little alarmed about myself. Just feel my hand." It was cold and clammy. He pulled off his boots, and, putting his feet to the fire, the heat made them steam. I said overwork was producing nervousness. "No," said he, "I am not tired." I said, "Such a scene as I have just witnessed is enough to make you nervous." "How much you are mistaken!" said he. "I have made two people happy to-day. I have given a mother her son and a wife her husband."

Washington had many admirable traits worthy of imitation, and one of them was rigid punctuality. This was well illustrated by an incident during his visit to Boston a hundred years ago. Having appointed eight o'clock in the morning as the hour at which he should set out for Salem, he mounted his horse just as the Old South clock was striking that hour. The company of cavalry which was to escort him did not arrive till after his departure and did not overtake him till he had reached Charles River bridge.

P.S.

The point of a woman's letter is always the postscript. We will send (free of charge) a sample bag of Bradley's to any woman mailing us her address. "Yorkshire" Salt is free from lime and dirt, and won't harden in damp weather. Let us know if you can't buy it at your grocer's. He can supply you if you insist.

"Yorkshire" Salt

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

Dainty Books of Verse

WILD FLOWER SONNETS.

By EMILY SHAW FORMAN With twelve illustrations from original drawings by Abbott Graves. (One volume, 16mo, fancy cloth and satine, gilt top, $1.00.

A series of graceful and exquisite verses in praise of our familiar wild flowers. A well known writer says of them: "I would to all the nine muses that our songsters and rhymsters could give us always something as pure as these sonnets. No one could have written them who did not comprehend nature. There is no mistake about the author's being a botanist, a lover of nature's accuracies. She has the skill of a collector, as well as the music of a singer and the eye of a poet."

CAP AND GOWN.

Some College Verse. Chosen by JOSEPH LEROY HARRISON. 1 vol., square 16mo, satine and gold binding, gilt top, $1.25, or full white morocco, flexible, round corners, gilt edges, $2.50.

"A relief to the reader weary with distilling tears from the alembic of the contemporaneous muse will be furnished by 'Cap and Gown.' Happy, careless, witty, everything but artificial or doleful are its moods."—The Chautauquan. "A volume which is full of happy and exuberant youth."—Christian Register.

OUT OF THE HEART.

Poems for Lovers, Young and Old. Selected by JOHN WHITE CHADWICK and ANNIE HATHAWAY CHADWICK. $1.25.

FROM QUEENS' GARDENS.

Selected Poems of Mrs. Browning, Jean Ingelow, Adelaide Procter, and others. Edited by ROSE PORTER. $1.25.

THE TWO VOICES.

Poems of the Mountains and the Sea. Edited by JOHN WHITE CHADWICK. $1.25.

STAFF AND SCRIP.

Gems of Religious Thought. Selected by J. H. GILBERT. $1.25.

HYMNS OF THE HIGHER LIFE.

A New Collection of Religious Verse. $1.25.

The above five books, with half-tone frontispiece to each, all in white cloth binding, with ornamental paper sides. Each book in a box.

PIPE AND POUCH.

The Smoker's Own Book of Poetry. Compiled by JOSEPH KNIGHT With frontispiece illustration in half-tone. 1 vol., square 16mo, ornamental cloth binding, gilt top, $1.25, or full havana colored leather, flexible, round corners, gilt edges, $2.50.

This somewhat unique volume of collected verse is the result of many years' gleaming from a great variety of sources of all the best verse devoted to praise of the weed. It will be a surprise to most readers to find how much has been written that is clever and bright on the theme of smoking.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, post or express paid, on receipt of price by the publishers.

JOSEPH KNIGHT COMPANY,
196 Summer Street, Boston.

"My First Is==="
A CENTURY OF CHARADES

By WILLIAM BELLAMY

A hundred original charades, ingenious in conception and worked out with remarkable skill. Sixth Thousand. 18mo, $1.00.

Mr. HENRY A. CLAPP, the brilliant lecturer on Shakespeare's plays, pronounces this "the cleverest work of its kind known to English literature," and adds, "In invention, ingenuity, wit, humor, and cunning but always honorable craftiness, it far surpasses all its predecessors."

"FRESH, ORIGINAL, sparkling charades on every subject under the sun; many easily guessed, and some which would puzzle Solomon himself."—Seattle Press Times.

"AN EXTREMELY BRIGHT little book, calculated to furnish much amusement to people of the brighter sort."—Christian Register, Boston.

Sold by all Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.

If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

"A Beautiful Edition of
A Notable Book"

Standish of Standish

BY

JANE GOODWIN AUSTIN

With 20 Photogravures by F. T. MERRILL.

In two beautiful volumes, bound in attractive style.

PRICE $5.00

"It is a pity that Mrs. Austin did not live to see the beautiful new Holiday Edition of her first Pilgrim story. To the ever fascinating narrative is now added the charm of twenty photogravure illustrations."—Worcester Spy.

The publishers have shown excellent taste and judgment in lavishing special holiday honors upon this volume of Mrs. Austin's. It is in all respects worthy the selection. It is accurate in the historic facts upon which it is built; quaint and exquisite in expression and literary style; as sturdy in tone as its subject rightfully demands, and is developed along personal and romantic lines with rare skill and a sustained interest. . . . The drawings are wonderfully good in a simplicity and grace difficult of achievement.—Portland Transcript.

It has numerous photogravure illustrations which recall the days of the Pilgrims and Plymouth colony with an accuracy and artistic taste that would have gladdened the heart of the author . . . It will be a favorite gift from book-lovers to book-lovers the coming holiday season.—Boston Gazette.

Sold by booksellers. Sent postpaid by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.
BOSTON

NO BETTER GIFT

For a friend fond of singing Hymns than

Hymns for Church and Home, with Tunes,

Edited by Mrs. MARY W. TILESTON and Mr. ARTHUR FOOTE, and published this fall.

Read what Rev. Edward A. Horton says of it in Every Other Sunday:—

"It is a volume of fine appearance, toward which the binder has given his best efforts. As for substance, it contains the results of Mrs. Tileston's editing; and that is a sure guarantee of poetical excellence. The music has been edited by Mr. Arthur Foote, and his taste is unquestioned. Herein are treasures new and old. Aided by the experiences of the past, both Mrs. Tileston and Mr. Foote have endeavored to give churches what may be called a 'working' book of praise. We mean by that such a collection of tunes as embodies old and new, difficult and easy, stately and bright music. On the other hand, the hymns are of wide range, combining the austere of Watts with the graciousness of Whittier. The best modern poets are represented in this collection, as well as the standard writers. Of course, the whole tone of the collection is congenial to the tastes and wishes of liberal Christians."

The book is a square 8vo, of 512 pages, contains 801 hymns, and is handsomely and substantially bound in morocco.

Price $1.50, for which a copy will be sent to any address, postage paid.

A discount of 20 per cent. to societies introducing the book, and to clergymen, to whom a copy will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1.20.

American Unitarian Association,
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

CHATTERBOX

THE KING OF JUVENILES. No book has ever been made for young people which compares in value, or has had one-tenth the sale of this great annual. Millions of copies have been sold. The new volume for 1895-6 is just ready, and has over 200 large and entirely new pictures, several new stories, (each a book in itself), and hundreds of short stories, anecdotes, etc. The best Xmas present possible for boys and girls of all ages. Order from your bookseller or of us,

ESTES & LAURIAT, Publishers, Boston.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

THREE ESSEX COUNTY MINISTERS:

REV. THOMAS T. STONE, D.D., REV. AUGUSTUS WOODBURY, D.D., REV. OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM.

The death of three of the old Essex County ministers who in the last of the forties and the early fifties were near neighbors and coworkers in the liberal pulpit and on the anti-slavery platform brings back to many of us the memory of those stirring days when it cost something to stand up for the right and for that liberty which only now has at Saratoga in 1894 and in Washington in 1895 been fully recognized as the true basis of the liberal faith called Unitarianism.

One can hardly believe that these words were spoken at the installation of the successor of the older of the trio,—words which were supposed to apply to his ministry: "Our congregations generally are willing to allow their minister all the liberty that he can rightfully ask; but they do not allow him to be a monomaniac, constantly iterating and reiterating certain peculiar views, simply because he knows them to be disagreeable to his hearers. Nor do they allow him to mix up his personal feelings of anger, indignation, or scorn with the solemn message that he is to deliver with love and sorrow as a minister of Christ."

It is difficult now to understand that the elder was driven from his pulpit in Salem, that a similar movement was made against the second, and that the third was obliged to find his place outside of the body into which he was born and ordained, in order that he might have that liberty not accorded in the Unitarian body as controlled and governed from 1850 to 1894.

The writer recalls the first time that he heard Mr. Woodbury preach, with that manly, straightforward, persuasive force that always characterized his preaching; and then in the evening he heard him speak before the Salem Female Anti-slavery Society, to an audience, he thinks, of not more than twelve people, because of a most violent rain-storm, with all of the earnestness and fervor which he could command, upon a subject that enlisted his whole soul, and with the same power and care as if he had been speaking before a sympathetic audience in a hall crowded to its fullest capacity.

This incident in Mr. Woodbury's public life was characteristic; and an intimate acquaintance from that day to the day of his death has only deepened and emphasized the appreciation of his character, which was marked by the same manly, truthful, courageous, and faithful qualities which were that day revealed, and which never failed him up to the end.

Of Mr. Frothingham's deep earnestness and broad liberality, combined with a degree of literary culture and rare beauty of expression, which we as Unitarians will now claim as our inheritance, too much cannot be said. Some felt that Mr. Frothingham was cold, but the writer is not one of those who found him so; but little wonder that the young man who sprang with enthusiasm and with unflinching steps into the liberal thought foreshadowed by Channing, confident that he would have a sympathetic following and companionship in the paths to which it led, should have grown less fervid and somewhat reserved when he found these to whom he had a right to look for sympathy and support failed him, or turned the cold shoulder, or secretly, if they did not openly, oppose him.

Stone, Woodbury, Frothingham,—different in their life, in their temperament, and in their habits of thought, alike in their fidelity to truth, to humanity, and to the dictates of their consciences, liberal leaders into broader fields of enlarged liberty, in which the right of private judgment is recognized as the God-given prerogative of every human being,—you have lived to see a large fruition from the seeds which you have sown.

REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

In the many tributes to Rev. O. B. Frothingham, beautiful as they are, there is one note in the harmony of his life that is seldom touched. I mean his high spirituality, which to many, who knew him intimately, seemed the key-note to his character, dominating every action.

It showed itself in his radicalism by triumphing over his natural conservatism and forcing him to do the work of an iconoclast, not from an inherent love of destruction, but that he might reveal the eternal verities. He often expressed great regret that ill-health prevented him from building up the new religion, which, he maintained, must be a more spiritual religion, and was the great need of the age.

Large numbers of his sermons testify to this divine gift: in fact, it underlies them all. To recall his prayers is to enter the holy of holies, so fraught were they with reverence, even to the tones of his beautiful voice; and many souls in that vast congregation in New York, with the weight of their cares and sorrows, were borne on the flood-tide of his pure aspiration into the very presence of the Infinite, there to find consolation and strength and uplifting.

To many who knew Mr. Frothingham slightly, and simply as a man of fine intellect, this statement may be a surprise; but to me who had known him for more than forty years, and to whom he had always been the truest of friends, this trait of spirituality seemed the most prominent in his character.

Spiritual Life.

Peace is the greatest of blessings when it is won and kept by manhood and wisdom; but it is a blessing that will not long be the housemate of cowardice.—Lowell.

The humble, meek, merciful, just, pious, devout souls are everywhere of one religion; and, when death has taken off the mask, they will know one another, though the diverse liveries they wear here make them strangers.—William Penn.

Even if in the midst of an avalanche of work he calls you "apart into a desert place to rest awhile," and even if the desert mean only a headache, or a rainy day instead of a journey, make no complaint, but follow close.—Anna Warner.

A faith that does not make desire purer, and motive higher, and conduct holier, and character more beautiful with truth and sympathy and charity, can not be an orthodox faith, though it claim the sanction of innumerable creeds; for orthodoxy means right thinking, and right thinking is only the rational side of right living.—Philip Stafford Moxom.

The presence of God is not a vague sense or abstract feeling or arbitrary faith, but shapes itself in every object of light and lustre, of strength and terror, sweetness and tenderness, in every kind of order, beauty, progress, and righteousness, in every insect, bird, animal, man, or angel. The sense of it inevitably grows as the mind grows in spiritual fervor.—Mozoomdar.

The way of life is by no means smooth, but let us not make it rougher than it is. The world is not all we could wish; but, if it goes wrong, let us not spend ourselves trying to make it go worse. Rather let us make it a little smoother and a little pleasanter by our disposition, manners, and deeds. If men in general are out of sorts, there is the more need of our being in sorts.—John Learned.

Immortality is nothing but the fact translated of immutable morality. We are so bound up with eternal ideas and God that we have the fact of immortality by moral impression. Feeding, or prepared to feed, on the eternal and immutable, feeling it stir within us evermore, we need not ask for it, or go after it to fetch it by wise argumentations: we have its certifying touch already felt in our consciousness.—H. Bushnell.

Somatose
A Scientific Food.

consisting of albumoses, the elements necessary for nutrition—Is palatable, and stimulates the appetite—Is easily digestible, and does not overtax the stomach—Is readily assimilated, producing a rapid gain in flesh and strength—Is not expensive, as only a small quantity is necessary because of its concentrated nature.

Supplied in 2-oz., ¼, ½, and 1-pound tins; also the following combinations:

Somatose-Biscuit.—(10% Somatose). Palatable, nourishing—a valuable addition to the diet.

Runkel Bros' Somatose-Cocoa (10% Somatose), for nursing mothers, invalids and convalescents. A desirable addition to the diet of children, and a pleasant beverage, both nourishing and stimulating, for table use.

Runkel Bros' Somatose-Chocolate (10% Somatose), for eating and drinking.

All druggists Send for free descriptive pamphlets. Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents.

"THE MORE YOU SAY THE LESS PEOPLE REMEMBER." ONE WORD WITH YOU

SAPOLIO

BAKE A BATCH OF BISCUITS

Sift one quart of flour, two rounding teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and one teaspoonful of salt into a bowl; add three teaspoonfuls of COTTOLENE and rub together until thoroughly mixed; then add sufficient milk to make a soft dough; knead slightly, roll out about half an inch thick, and cut with a small biscuit cutter. Place a little apart in a greased pan, and bake in a quick oven for fifteen or twenty minutes. These biscuits should be a delicate brown top and bottom, light on the sides, and snowy white when broken open.

The secret of success in this recipe, as in others, is to use but two-thirds as much Cottolene as you used to use of lard. Cottolene will make the biscuit light, delicious, wholesome. Better than any biscuit you ever made before. Try it. Be sure and get genuine Cottolene. Sold everywhere in tins with trade-marks—'Cottolene' and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY, CHICAGO, 224 State Street, BOSTON, PORTLAND, ME.

[NEW EDITION.]

Uplifts of Heart and Will.

In Prose and Verse.

By JAMES H. WEST,

Author of "The Complete Life," "In Love with Love," etc.

PRESS NOTICES.

London Inquirer.—Helpful and interesting. The fact that a second thousand has been called for will be some guarantee of such a book's claim to notice.

London Christian Life.—A book good for both old and young and for all alike.

Yale Literary Magazine.—The poems included in the book are impressive, many of them being of a high order.

Woman's Tribune.—Not dogmatic, deeply reverent, appealing to the divine within the human soul, calling it to the heights of larger helpfulness and blessedness.

American Hebrew.—Prose and verse that will surely appeal to an ever-widening circle of readers. It is gratifying to know that a new edition has been demanded.

Boston Herald.—One is very strongly impressed with the sincerity and reality of expression.

The Unitarian.—The earnestness, indeed the eagerness, of the writer cannot fail to quicken a helpful and elevating aspiration in the heart of every reader.

Cloth, bevelled, red edges, 50 cts.

For sale by booksellers or sent postpaid by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - Boston, Mass.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "Blessed be Drudgery," "A Year of Miracle," etc.

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

Published in three styles:

Gift edition, fine cloth, wide margins, 60 pages, 50 cents.

Paper, ornamental, 26 pages, 15 cents. (In white, if desired.)

Cheap edition, 6 cents (ten copies for 30 cents, net).

"In 'The House Beautiful,' Rev. Wm. C. Gannett describes, with a rare combination of good sense and poetic insight, the essentials of a beautiful home, giving to flowers, books, and guests, for instance, their due place in its furnishing, while love is the bond that binds all together in gracious influence."—Literary World.

"It is on the side of sincerity, quietness, and simplicity. Meets with our entire approval."—The Critic.

"Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on 'The dear Togetherness' is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. Our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and, if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so."—The New Unity.

For sale by booksellers or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR DECEMBER.

"The Wilderness shall be Glad." Rev. Francis B. Hornbrook.

The Theology of Unitarians. Dr. Charles Carroll Everett.

Concord. H. Hayes Robbins.

Christmas Day. William Brunton.

Merit Recovery. Rev. Eli Fay, D.D.

Daily Sacrifice. Rev. Stopford W. Brooke.

The Open Vision. Rev. George H. Hosmer.

Like and Unlike.

The Outlook for Christian Union. W. H. Ramsay.

Installing a Minister. N. M. Brigham.

The National Conference. M. J. Savage.

Unity and Diversity. J. S. Lee.

Always Growing.

One Upward Look Each Day.

Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor.

Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Alice P. Jackson;

Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Eliot; Literary Notes—Some Books.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.

2. God in the City.

3. Reaping Time.

4. Called to be Saints.

5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)

6 The Religious Situation.

7. The Forward Movement of Unitarianism. (By Rev. George Batchelor.)

8. Our Divine Partnership.

9. Dr. Gordon's Book, "The Christ of Today."

10. Thanks that I can be Thankful.

11. The Morning Song of the Creation. (By Rev. Robert Collyer.)

12. Some Lessons from the Life of O. B. Frothingham.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.
2. The Beseeching God.
3. Christian Unity.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Charities and Reforms.

In Brussels, by order of the city council, the infant schools are to be kept open the entire year. The purpose is to note the physical and mental development of the children of the very poor. The plan will be accomplished by having two relays of teachers.—Lend a Hand.

The New Jersey Training School for feeble-minded Children sends out an interesting annual report, which shows that the manual training department has been extended and improved, that the children are better classified, and that there is continual endeavor to find the wisest methods of caring for their unfortunate charges.

English statistics agree with ours in showing that insanity or lunacy is on the increase. According to the report of the British Commissioners on Lunacy, issued recently, the total number of lunatics, idiots, and persons of unsound mind was, on January 1 of this year, 94,081,—an increase of 2,014 over the number for the preceding year. The increase was confined almost wholly to the pauper class, however. This is said to be due to the more general reception in asylums of cases of simple mental decay, resulting from extreme old age.

A practical move is on foot in England, under the direct supervision of Lady Henry Somerset, whereby an inebriate home is provided for women of the better class needing other than the help of their own resolutions to reform. The "Duxhurst Home" includes, first, what is called the "Mansion." This building, which has been rented by the National Board of the Woman's Temperance Association, will accommodate seven guests. Its entire conduct will be that of a home where comfort and refinement abound. The profits arising from the "Mansion" are to be expended in the support of a home farm for poorer women; and, besides these, there will be a nursery cottage and an intermediate home for ladies' maids, wives of small shopkeepers, etc. Into this home patients will only be admitted upon a pledge to remain at the home under entire abstinence for twelve months at least.—Union Signal.

Prof. Estlin Carpenter, speaking on "The Problems of the City" at the public meeting which concluded the London Provincial Assembly, referred to the vast and complex social life of London, and remarked: "We shall never touch the hearts of those who live in the midst of it till we press less upon them the claims of a literary and philosophical argument remote from their lives, and depend less upon a reference to a Master whose ideas were in many ways far different from the workman of to-day. How could they help being bewildered when we offer them a Book which it is difficult to understand, and which contains doctrines we do not believe and records that we consider unhistorical? We must approach these men, showing them that their own lives include the working of the principles of religion, that great moral and spiritual forces are moulding this vast city life, and there teach them to seek the voice of God."

Education.

Prof. Charles F. Thwing says, in the Forum, that the average cost of the student per year at the leading colleges is larger than the total income of the average American family. Every element of the cost of an education has in the last sixty years increased three or four fold.

A stroke of good fortune has come to the American Education Society in the shape of a gift of $60,000 from a modest New England man who wishes his name to remain unknown. This sum is to constitute an endowment fund, the income of which will go toward the general work of the society.

Science.

The habits of our ants have been reported on by Mr. G. B. King in the entomological journal, Psyche. He has found forty-one species in Essex County, Massachusetts; and, while Wasmann mentions thirty-four species of mites dwelling as fellow-boarders, or parasites, on ants in Europe and elsewhere, King has found half that number already in Massachusetts.

One of the novelties on board the new American steamship "St. Louis" is an electric organ, with a switch attached, by means of which the current can be cut off when the player fails to please his audience, or when, for any reason, one wishes the music discontinued. It is asserted that the switch was put in to save the passengers from the annoyance of incompetent players.

A recent paper gave an account of an arrangement of electric wires, by which in India a man hoped that a snake intending to enter his house would receive a fatal shock; and we can see what a blessing such an arrangement would be when we learn that in 1893 21,213 human beings and 5,122 cattle were killed in India by snake bites, notwithstanding 117,120 snakes were killed in the course of the year.—Independent.

One of our medical exchanges calls attention to the harmfulness of cough mixtures, which should be regarded as a relic of ancient and unscientific methods of practice. The principal ingredient is usually opium, which, indeed, lessens the tendency to cough, but at the same time arrests every secretion of the body. Says one physician, "You might as well take a brush and varnish your patient all over as to cover him up with cough mixtures."

Here and There.

In Denmark an industry has been commenced during the last year in exporting milk in a frozen state. The milk is frozen by means of ice and salt, and it is sent in barrels by rail and steamer to London. The milk keeps quite fresh for twenty days. The details of the process have been patented.

Few industries involve so great loss of life, in proportion to the number of men engaged, as the cod fishery. Every year the little city of Gloucester, Mass., the headquarters of the industry, makes up its list of lost, and holds a memorial service for them. This year the number of Gloucester men who were lost on fishing-vessels was ninety-two.

Persia is about to be provided with a new railroad. The line is being engineered by the czar's officials, and constructed by means of Muscovite capital. Apart from the political consequences of this line, the practical opening up of a great country so rich and yet so undeveloped as Persia cannot fail to prove of immense interest to trade and industry in every part of the civilized world.

An historic elm-tree at Plymouth, Pa., three miles from Wilkesbarre, was cut down recently for fear it would collapse during a heavy blow and cause damage. The elm was voted on March 2, 1774, by the town meeting as a place of public rendezvous, and was then referred to as "the noble tree upon which our ancestors have gazed." Subsequently to 1774 it served as an auction mart, village market, and whipping-post. A count of the rings upon it showed that the tree was three hundred and seventy-two years old.

The Greek girls of families of high social position make their debut at the age of ten, the occasion being a children's court ball held by King George and Queen Olga, every year at the palace, toward the end of November. They dress, like most debutantes, in white, and wear silk mits, their dark hair, nearly always curly, hanging, but tied together with ribbon. After the first appearance, they go to the ball every year until they marry or are too old for this festivity. Chaperonage is very strict, and arranged marriages very early, most girls being married before they are sixteen years old.

In this country rice-growing is principally confined to the four States of North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana. South Carolina raises nearly as much as all of the others together. Rice was first known there about the year 1700, when a vessel from some Pacific voyage put into the harbor of Charleston in distress. It had on board a sack of rice, which, as a curiosity, was presented to the city authorities. It was tested for garden culture, and, being found adapted to the lowlands of the Carolina coast, became at once popular, its cultivation spreading rapidly. In a few years it was taken to Louisiana, where conditions were somewhat similar; while to some extent the cultivation has spread to the West Indies, Central America, and some of the South American coasts.—Good Housekeeping.

doesn't polish, it scratches; so do the sharp, gritty particles of poor silver polish. There is one that polishes easily and quickly without scratching; it's the only perfect silver polish. Send for a sample and try it yourself.

ELECTRO SILICON

Post paid, 15c. It's sold everywhere.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

The Peddler Tells You,

possibly, that Pearline is too good for ordinary uses; he says, "of course it's nice enough for delicate things, but what I have is just as good for scrubbing, scouring, etc., and is cheaper." Now, we say this: Pearline is the best to use for everything, and the best is the cheapest, in the end. It does its work better—more easily, more quickly, more satisfactorily, more safely. Pearline is cheap enough for any use. These imitations are dear at any price and for almost any purpose. Compare the value of the things ruined with the small amount of money saved by the use of cheap powders.

Send it Back

When peddlers or unscrupulous grocers tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline," IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back.

384

JAMES PYLE, New York.

Artistic Effects

in watches for shoulder or belt wear.

Charming Shadings in enamel for evening gowns—light blue, pink, white or crimson.

POPULAR PRICES.

Our unquestioned guarantee with every watch.

The Waterbury Watch Co.

WATERBURY, CONN.

Send for our Catalogue No. 150

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A party will leave New York Wednesday, January 15, on the favorite steamship Werra, of the North German Lloyd Line, for a

SPECIAL TOUR THROUGH THE Mediterranean Countries,

Including Southern Italy, the Island of Sicily, Tunis, Algeria, and Southern Spain.

Incidental visits to Naples, Pompeii, Vesuvius, Capri, Sorrento, Rome, Taormina, Catania, Syracuse, Girgenti, Palermo, Tunis, Carthage, Bone, Hammam-Meskoutine, Constantine, Biskra (on the borders of the desert of Sahara), Batna, Lambessa, Timegad, Setif, Kharata, Gorge of the Chabet-el-Akhira, Bougie, Algiers, Blidah, Tlemcen, Oran, Malaga, Grenada, Gibraltar, etc.

A party will leave New York March 21, and, connecting with the above at Gibraltar, make an extended Tour through Spain, Portugal, France, etc.

March 21, May 16, May 23, June 20, and July 4.—Tours to Southern, Central, and Northern Europe.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines, also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired. (Special circular for the Mediterranean Tour.)

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street, opposite School St., Boston.

POWDER POINT SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Elementary and advanced classes. Individual teaching. Scholarships.

F. B. KNAPP, S.B., Duxbury, Mass.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address

JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address

HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS.

For circular address

E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.

REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin

BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and person a characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GARRETT P. SERVISS.
4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoology. By ROSSITER W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral line; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.
9. EVOLUTION OF SOCIETY: Primitive man; growth of the family, city, and State; development of the domestic relations; is society an organism? By JAMES A. SKILTON, Esq.
10. EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY: Origin of religious beliefs; ancestor-worship; nature-worship; the Absolute. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
11. EVOLUTION OF MORALS: How altruism grows out of egoism; the proper balance. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
12. PROOFS OF EVOLUTION: From geology, morphology, embryology, metamorphosis, rudimentary organs, geographical distribution, etc. By NELSON C. PARSHALL.
13. EVOLUTION AS RELATED TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: The Unknowable; design; miracle. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
14. THE PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION: Relation of the doctrine to prevailing philosophical systems. By STARR HOYT NICHOLS.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

ORGANIST.

A Harvard man, experienced, is open to engagement as organist. Address E. M. J., Box 348, Boston Post-office.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT HAND—FACTURERS' PRICES. 658
JOHN H. PRAY, Sons & Co.,
CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY,
WASHINGTON ST.,
OPP. BOYLSTON ST.,
BOSTON.

Pleasantries.

"Oh!" groaned Tommy, the day after Thanksgiving, as he took a bitter dose of medicine: "I wish I hadn't been so thankful yesterday."—Harper's Round Table.

Sub: "Here's a letter from 'Anxious Subscriber.'" Chief: "What does he want to know?" Sub: "He wants to know how long a man would live if there were no such thing as death."—Spare Moments.

The Summer Girl: "Oh, I love to hear you read your poems. It makes me realize how brave you are." Poet: "Brave?" Girl: "Yes, brave. You said you took them yourself to the publishers."—New York Ledger.

Their Redeeming Feature.—Mme. Bashleu: "I think Ruskin's titles for his books are so happy." Mme. Smithson: "How so?" Mme. Bashleu: "When you know the title of one of his books, you always know one of the things it isn't about."—American Reformer.

Boggs: "I honestly believe that Smythe married his wife on account of her good looks." Dudley: "Took her at her face value, as it were." Boggs: "And I've no doubt that Browne married his wife because her father was wealthy." Dudley: "Took her at her pa value, as it were."—American.

Little Helen dearly loved to hear her mother sing, and often listened while her mother was singing, as she worked about the house. Mrs. A. sung one song a great deal, in which occurred the words,—

"Go, forget me, and to-morrow Brightly smile and sweetly sing!"

Helen astonished her mother by suddenly asking one day, "What does he want the gopher to get him for?"—Pacific.

A striking sight in connection with the balloon ascent at Aberdeen Highland games was the stolid indifference of a policeman to the exciting event. Never for once was he seen to lift his eyes skyward to witness the fate of the parachutist. The circumstance called forth the remark that that Bobby's rigorous attention to duty would insure his promotion in the ranks. A wag retorted, "I question that, for no person will rise in his profession who does not see above his head."

Little Carrie had been instructed to learn a Scripture verse with the word "good" in it. Accordingly, her parents taught her, "It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day." The little maid repeated her text many times softly to herself before the beginning of the general exercise, in which all the Sunday-school classes were to join. Then, when her turn came, she sent a ripple over the audience by reciting, in clear but lisping accents, "It is awful to be good on the Sabbath day."—Youth's Companion.

The following story is from a good source: A former well-known Master of Balliol College, Oxford, came to a turnpike gate in a part of the country where he was not known, and found, on putting his hand into his pocket, that he had left all his money at home. The gatekeeper would not let him pass, whereupon the master, little accustomed to be thwarted by anybody, and much less by a rustic, showed signs of wishing to force his way, expostulating in utter amazement: "But, my good man, it will be all right. I am the Master of Balliol!" "Don't care what you're the master of; but, if you aren't master of twopence, you don't go through this gate," was the inexorable reply.—Churchman.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN.

A first-hand authority told me, the other day, an amusing story of Hans Christian Andersen's naiveté. That prince of fairylore received one Christmas a box of cakes from an unknown admirer, and at first was all gratification at the compliment. Suddenly a strange apprehension assailed him. He had just read some account of poison conveyed in this fashion. Possibly, the gift was the murderous device of a rival. With more aptitude than grace, he decided, in a half-absent fashion, to send them on to his friend, Mme. A., to test their quality. A day or two later he called. "Is Mme. A. in?" "Yes, sir." "Is she quite well?" "Quite, sir." "Could I see her?" "Certainly, sir." Face to face with Mme. A., he recurred to the same anxiety. "She was well?" "Yes." "The children well?" "Yes." "And had she received the cakes he sent? Eaten some? And was quite well? And the children had eaten some? And were quite well?" And then at last the old man's excitement boiled over. "You can't think how pleased I am," he said. "Those cakes were sent me by an unknown admirer, and I was afraid they might be poisoned. So I sent them on to you. And you have eaten them, and are quite well. You can't think how pleased I am!" And he passed out, smiling, and in high good humor.—Critic.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Vacuum Oil Company.

THE OIL THAT LUBRICATES MOST.

45 Purchase St., BOSTON. Telephone 1839

Its Screw and Plunge Lift (a) for regulating Wick; Its Lift Attachment (b) for Lighting Without Removing Chimney; with other Original Improvements, combine to make the

MILLER Lamp

Superior to All Others.

Illustrated Catalogue Sent Free.

EDWARD MILLER & CO., MILL AND FACTORY, MERIDEN, CONN. 63 Pearl St., Boston.

CLOCKS.

FRENCH TRAVELLING, ENGLISH HALL, GILT AND CRYSTAL.

GUARANTEED TIME-KEEPERS

Bigelow, Kennard & Co. 50 Washington St. cor West.

DYSPEPSIA FLOUR.

Also Special Diabetic Food, Barley Crystals, and Patent Biscuits, Cakes and Pastry Flour. Unrivalled in America or Europe. Pamphlets and Baking Samples Free. Write Farwell & Rhine, Watertown, N. Y., U. S. A.

XMAS DIALOGUES, Pieces to Speak and how to get up fascinating Sunday School Entertainment—all 1 c. J. & P. B. MYERS, 86 John St., N. Y.

The Great Church LIGHT.

FRANK'S Patent Reflectors give the Most Powerful, the Softest, Cheapest and the Best Light known for Churches, Stores, Show Windows, Parlors, Banks, Offices, Picture Galleries, Theatres, Depots, etc. New and elegant designs. Send size of room. Get circular and estimate. A liberal discount to churches and the trade. L. P. FRANK, 551 Pearl Street, N. Y.

USE BURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS
ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES..... 22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.
LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

Parties will leave Boston Jan. 23 and Feb. 13 for Two Grand Tours of 72 days through the Southern States

MEXICO AND CALIFORNIA

In Special Pullman Vestibuled Trains of Sleeping, Dining, and Composite Library Observation Cars. Ample time will be given to all the leading cities and other places of historic and picturesque interest in Mexico, including the Wonderful Temple Division of the Mexican Central Railway, a Week in the City of Mexico, and a Four Days' Trip over the Vera Cruz Railway. In California, San Diego, Los Angeles, Santa Monica, San Barbara, San Francisco, Monterey, etc., will be visited. The return tickets may be used from California on Any Regular Train until July, or with any one of Ten Parties under special Escort, with a Choice of Three Different Routes.

Tours to California, Mexico, omitting California, Florida, Japan, China, and the Sandwich Islands Washington and Lookout Mountain, Old Point Comfort, Gettysburg, etc.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular tour desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB.

296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building.

BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

EBBITT HOUSE,

WASHINGTON, D. C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Popular Prices. Regular rate $4.00 per day up. Fifty rooms on the sixth floor, with steam heat and electric light, reduced to $2.50 a day 3.00 per day. Fifty rooms on other floors reduced from $4.00 to $3.50 per day. Parlors and alcove parlors are equally low rates. Special rates for the Army and Navy Officers and the Clergy.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1895.

NUMBER 51.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; A Many-sided Feast; Christmas, . . .	829
Chinking; The Obligation of the Surplus, . . .	830
MUSINGS,	830
BREVITIES,	831
PRO AND CON.
Johnson, not Beecher; The Turk at Home, . .	831
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
The Gift and the Giver, by Alice W. Rollins, .	831
Christmas Day Reflections, by Hon. Noah Davis; Christmas Days in Prison, by a Prisoner; The Angels' Song, by Rev. John W. Chadwick,	832
The Christmas Message, by Jane Smith; The Human Christmas, by Rev. M. J. Savage, .	833
American Unitarian Association,	834
Meadville Theological School, by Robert S. Loring; Birds and the Farmer, by E. P. Powch,	843
Russia as it is, by Sophie Friedland; Sigmonds,	844
Rev. Obed Eldridge; Mental Healing; What Boys at Rugby learn,	845
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	834
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	834
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	834
LITERATURE.
Book Notices,	836
Recent Poetry; Miscellaneous,	838
Magazines; The Ladies' Commission,	839
Books Received,	840
THE HOME.
The Son of a Carpenter, by May White Ovington, Nannie's Christmas Eve, by Mary C. Baird; His Children's Friend; "Chow-Chow,"	841
POETRY.
A Bethlehem Town, by Rev. John M. Scott, . .	831
Christmas-tide, by Ida M. Cooke,	836
The Christmas Song, by Rev. William Brunton, .	841
The Light of Bethlehem,	842
To my Father's Quadrant, by John White Chadwick,	843
The Christmas Story, by Hattie Tyng Griswold, .	844
The Man of Nazareth,	845
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	844
HERE AND THERE,	845
SCIENCE,	845
PLEASANTRIES,	846

these horrors is immediate European occupation, and this ought to have been effected ten months ago. In spite of war talk the United States cannot furnish this occupation. But Russia could occupy Armenia within a week, and, if England would back her up, would probably do so. The time for diplomacy has passed: the time for action has come.

THE wave of immigration which so many years ago first beat on American shores has continued to surge. But the movement from the East to the West has not been confined to the movement from abroad. There has been another migration within the States themselves,—a strong movement from the East to the West, and but a slight movement in the other direction. This movement from the New England and Atlantic States to the great West has been fraught with no disaster or danger to the Western communities. It has furnished, rather, a foundation of political order and social stability upon which many of them have been built. That there has been less migration to the South is partly due to the conditions which prevail there. It might have been supposed that the enfranchisement of the Negro would be followed by a large rush of the colored people to the North. But this has not taken place. Indeed, the mobility of the Negro in the Southern States themselves is less than might be supposed.

AN interesting article on the general subject is that of Prof. W. F. Willcox in the Political Science Quarterly for December on "Decrease in Interstate Migration." In a series of tables and charts Prof. Willcox presents some interesting facts in regard to the movement of population in the United States. In recent years the great region of increased migration is found in the North Central States, Illinois, Iowa, and Kansas. "Between 1880 and 1890 over half a million natives of these three States alone must have migrated across a State line,—an outflow equal to nearly one-tenth of the total immigration to the United States during the same period." Taking the country as a whole during the ten years between 1880 and 1890, Vermont and Nevada sent out the largest percentage of emigrants; but it is shown that interstate immigration has relatively decreased during the last score of years, both in the country as a whole and in nearly every one of the States east of the Mississippi. It does not follow, however, that there is not a movement of population within the States themselves. Indeed, there is now a strong movement of population from the country to the city, which does not overstep State lines. But the general conclusion of Prof. Willcox is that the mobility of the population of the Eastern United States is slowly decreasing. This is a matter which has been left to the regulation furnished by natural social and political laws, and which, fortunately, legislators have not sought to hinder or to interfere with.

THE suggestion that the "Red Cross" should take up the work of Armenian relief has met a response from the noble pioneer and leader of that organization, Clara Barton, who, though in advanced years, is willing to go to Turkey and personally supervise the relief work. The society is now organized not only in America, but in Europe, and even in Japan, where its work in the recent war was highly valued. It would seem most practical to send scouts ahead, so to speak, or commissioners, who should secure the necessary condition for successful work. If the sultan will allow such work to be done, it matters little whether it is done under the name of the Red Cross or the Red Crescent. It is work for humanity, under whatever symbol it is administered. If it is found that the Red Cross and the Red Crescent can work together to save this winter thousands of people from perishing of starvation, there can be no better way of spending our Christmas than by making offerings to this fund. We talk so much about sending munitions of war to Armenia: let us show our good faith by sending munitions of peace.

IN days gone by royalty was the patron of literature and art. To-day it is the newspaper and magazine. The New York Herald has just awarded a prize of $10,000 to Julian Hawthorne for the best serial story in a competition started by that journal. In Paris Le Petit Journal announces that it will give 155,000 francs in prizes in a similar competition for the best French novel. The first prize will be 50,000 francs, or $10,000; the second prize, 40,000 francs, the third 35,000, the fourth 30,000. This is a large sum of money to devote to prizes. The object of these papers is, of course, not so much to promote literature as to promote their own circulation. It remains to be seen whether the successful competitors will really make any important contribution to modern literature. Undoubtedly, a good deal of good literature and of good music have simply been pot-boiling composition. In later times we do not expect men and women to work in old garrets at starvation prices. The "successful author" to-day generally has a fair amount of money mingled with his success. The literary standard has been joined to the commercial one; and it is doubtful if any book would be regarded as "successful" to-day, whatever its intrinsic worth, that did not bring its author a good return in money. If the best things are the best paid, all the better; but this has not yet been proven. As a matter of fact, with few exceptions, the plays which yield the most money to authors and managers are mediocre; the authors whose works have the largest circulation in the United States are story-writers for the cheaper weeklies, whose names are scarcely known in the realm of higher literature; and the most popular song-writers, some of whom have made out of a single song as much as Mr. Julian Hawthorne has received from his story, are not musicians, and some of them cannot read a note.

THE sixteenth annual report of the Associated Charities of Boston shows that there has been more than the normal amount of distress during the past year, as a whole, although things have improved from the hard times of the year before. The report is valuable, showing clearly the aim of the Association, the importance of friendly visiting, the value of work already accomplished, etc. The conference reports are most interesting in their accounts of individual cases.

A MANY-SIDED FEAST.

Christmas is one of the most comprehensive of feasts. Though it is affected by local customs, it is universally observed through Christendom. It is a feast of the home. It appeals to children and parents, old and young, rich and poor. It is a festival of the fireside, but also of the altar. It matters not whether Jesus was born on this day or on some other. The day has become for the Christian Church the feast of the incarnation.

It is a festival, not only for the home and the Church, but for the mart. It stimulates trade and industry. Immortal treasures in art, music, and literature, have been born from the Christmas festival.

Thus there is no festival more comprehensive than that of Christmas, which kindles two continents and the isles of the sea with its cheer, which fans the flame of domestic love, glows in the altar fire, quickens the pen of the writer, the brush of the artist, the soul of the musician, and most of all rings out on the ear of the world the millennial notes of the gospel of peace on earth, good will to men.

CHRISTMAS.

We are a little puzzled by the unrelenting hostility with which the Puritans set their faces against all recognition of Christmas, not understanding readily how even their somewhat gloomy imaginations were able to construe the festivities of the season into that awful figure of the "Scarlet Woman" which continually haunted their thoughts. But it is not so very difficult to understand those fearfully earnest people, when we make a picture of the times in which they lived; and, if we have not already judged and condemned them for their intolerance, we soon discover that the wild license of the age furnished much more than a flimsy pretext for their action.

After all, the Puritan has won more often than he has been defeated. If a reasonable representative of that faith could now come back to earth, instead of being horrified by what our present life would show him, he might find abundant reason to say to himself that he had not lived in vain. One reason why he did not observe Christmas was because he had learned that there is really no adequate historic evidence to determine on what day of the year Christ was born. So far as his knowledge went, he was bound to stand for the truth of things, against "popish and prelatial customs" that made slight account of such a needful basis. Well, we have come to a time when History is free to tell all she knows or can discover, and when no fear of Churchmen held before their eyes can have so much as a feather's weight in restraining honest students from publishing the exact and entire results of their investigations. We may therefore unite with Christendom to celebrate the birth of Christ on the day that tradition has assigned, without fear that we thereby prejudice the interests of veracious history; and the aforesaid reasonable Puritan would no doubt join with us if he were here.

Moreover, the revelries of the twelve successive holidays by which old England celebrated Christmas have now been shorn of their coarse and boisterous features, so that, again, the Puritan has triumphed in the stand he took against the drunken observance of a religious festival. Whether, if he were to sit in judgment upon our customs of to-day, he might not find his conscience troubled by the extremes to which our exchange of Christmas gifts has been carried is a fair question for debate. Doubtless the shop-keepers would maintain that the more we make of such a laudable custom the better. But some slight suspicion of an interested motive might attach to their evidence; and, from the standpoint of the wearied shopper, whose ribs have suffered from the thrusts of frantic elbows at many a crowded counter, and whose brain is well-nigh exhausted by the effort to match a long list of friends by an equally long list of appropriate gifts, there is much to be said on the other side.

If one could think that all these presents are bestowed in pure love and good will! But, alas! too many of them are the payments exacted for favors past or the hopeful bait of favors yet to come. These things would trouble the Puritanic conscience not a little, and perhaps lead to some very solemn questionings. Let us hope, however, that these considerations would produce no more than a passing cloud of righteous reproof and indignation on the face of our good Puritan. After all, there is an immense deal of Christmas cheer which is as pure and sweet and wholesome as heart could wish. Just where the balance lies between this brighter and the darker side who can say? Certainly, there is not enough of the abuse to justify us in making a wholesale onslaught

SPECIMEN COPIES of the Christian Register will be sent free for four weeks to any one wishing to examine it. Application should be made with address in full to

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Editorial.

NOTHING is more discouraging in regard to the Armenian question than the general apathy of the Christian powers to whom we must look for its settlement. It is now thirteen months since the first news was received of the Armenian massacre. The difficulty then was to get officials to believe that such a massacre had taken place, and so we had to wait for the slow methods of diplomacy in securing the appointment of a commission to make the necessary investigation. Even the newspapers were lacking in enterprise in securing information. The necessary corroboration of first reports was furnished by American missionaries; and afterward English and American newspapers waked up, and gave detailed reports. There is no one of the five great powers that has not had official information for many months of these atrocities; and yet nothing has been done about it,—at least, nothing but talk. Thousands of Armenians have been sacrificed in the mean time. The only thing that can stop at once on the practice of Christmas giving; and the children's stockings in the chimney corner are probably, on the whole, the most significant, as well as the most pleasant facts we are called upon to consider.

One of the best things about Christmas is the way in which old pagan customs and traditions have got tangled up with the Christian celebration. It would be a sorry day for us if ever the blood of our pagan ancestors should cease to flow in our veins, and the influence of their strong, nature-loving vitality should cease to be felt in our minds. The growth of Christianity would have been impossible in the Western world except for the soil which Paganism had prepared, and it is most fitting and inevitable that some natural fruit from this soil should still mingle with the Christian harvest.

The objection that Christmas is so largely a pagan festival is not well taken, or, rather, the criticism rightly understood becomes a commendation. We decorate our houses and our churches with branches from the forest, not knowing, perhaps, that this is what the Druids taught our forefathers to do, in order that some influence from the spirits of the wood might bless and protect their homes. But, though we have lost the superstition, we have kept the love for nature's green boughs which is our legacy from that distant past. Christianity is intensely—one might almost say exclusively—human in the circle of its thoughts and interests. It needs the setting and the counterpoise that a strong love of outward nature affords; and the Christmas decorations twined about the columns of our churches furnish a very good symbol of the way in which many an Old World legend, dear to our hearts, helps to keep our life in touch with wholesome, out-of-door realities.

CHINKING.

When the pioneer goes into the wilderness and builds his cabin, he first lays up the tiers of logs one above the other; and, when that part of the work is done, he drives smooth-trimmed saplings into the slits between the rough timbers. The walls are then nearly impervious to wind and weather. Still, gleams of light come through; and, if a winter storm were blowing, snow would sift in at the cracks, and wind would find entrance in chilly draughts at unwelcome seasons. So the careful builder goes over the work once more, and chinks the crevices with moss or clay or mortar till the wall is a strong, close surface, warm and substantial, serving for shelter, and not unbeautiful in its varied tones of brown and gray. The logs have given strength; but the chinking has added to the warmth, the snugness, and the beauty of the home.

There is a deal of chinking that might be done in other ways than with clay or mortar. One of the bugbears of some people is a fear of overwork. They are industrious for certain hours in the day, and then allow hands and brain to collapse, and idle away more time than they have worked, thinking that thus the body regains force and strength. The truth is that, making allowance for necessary sleep, the body and mind recover poise more by change of occupation than from cessation, so long as there is a normal degree of health. The scientific gymnast does not run till he is exhausted, and then lie down to rest his legs. He runs as long as is wise, and then exercises his arms and the upper part of his body, to counteract the weariness of the lower half. The man who has been sitting at his desk all day, if he is prudent, will take a brisk walk to change the course of the life current and even up things. If he has been poring over figures during the business hours, he will spend his evenings over some utterly different thing, if he wishes to keep his brain active and well.

Prison experience shows that, where the men are allowed to chink their time with a variety of employments, their health is invariably better. There are some sentimentalists who deplore the hard work that prisoners are obliged to do as part of their punishment; but some of the most humane as well as intelligent wardens testify that in the prisons in this country they have never seen prisoners overworked. If they fail in health under the monotony of prison life, it is because, after their work, they are shut up in their cells in idleness the rest of the time. As soon as studies and lectures and amusements are introduced, so that there is no time for idleness, the discipline improves, and the men are better in health. For it is not work itself, but monotony, worry, and friction, combined with unhygienic habits, that are responsible for most physical break-downs in or out of prison.

In boarding-schools it is the same. It has been the experience of more than one large school that, where too much time was left for recreation, which usually meant sitting about doing nothing for the greater number or opportunity for unworthy things for some, the discipline of the school fell; while, if every hour had its appointed task, the standard rose. At Hampton there are nearly a thousand boys and girls together. From five in the morning till bedtime every half-hour has its duty. It may be study or recitation or play or industrial training or religious service, but there is not a cranny left unprovided for. They are not driven with hot haste from one thing to another; but the hours are simply fitted together by invisible links, so that each day is like a well-built and well-chinked wall.

In homes there might be more judicious evening up of the time without hurting the children. When the boy comes home from the school-room, where he has been laying up the logs for the walls of his educational home, let him be sent to play in the open air or given employment of hand or definite recreation,—anything to keep him from learning to loaf about the house. So, when the little girl comes home, it is folly to let her throw herself down in the easiest chair in the room, after the too frequent manner of American girls, and sit in absolute idleness. The good old fashion of a bit of "catch-up work," always at hand, is better than that. Or there may be light domestic employment that would be far better than lounging for the girl whose brain is a little tired with study all the morning. The thing to be avoided is hurrying, worrying, nagging, the child; but at the same time the chinking should be done, that habits of consecutive thought and consecutive industry may be learned. Otherwise it is never easy to turn from slothful ways to do genuine work. As a country farmer expressed it, "The hardest job I ever done was gettin' at it."

This chinking of the minutes means, in the course of the years, ability to play all sorts of games, to use the hands in deft and useful ways. It means ability to read in other tongues. It means music and art. It means being useful and accomplished; and, above all, it means a steady holding to purpose and a life so full of interest and variety that there is no time left for the indulgence of vicious tastes and immoral habits.

THE OBLIGATION OF THE SURPLUS.

Mr. Thomas Hughes, at the close of one of his visits to this country, in an address at the Cooper Institute on the evening before he sailed, declared, as the result of his observation, that what most impressed him was the great amount of money which was given by rich men to public objects. Since the time of this statement there has been a marked increase in this direction. There are several cases of individuals who have given millions of dollars for various public institutions. The growth of the altruistic spirit, which is only a scientific form of defining the great Christian law of love to our neighbor, is a marked feature of modern civilization, and is recognized by social philosophers, like Herbert Spencer and Benjamin Kidd, as well as by practical philanthropists, like Dorothea Dix and Edward Everett Hale. When a rich man dies and leaves no public bequests, the fact is noted in a way which demands an excuse for the omission. No observer of modern society, especially in this country, can fail to note the growing conviction of the moral obligation on the part of the rich that they ought to use their wealth as a trust; and the causes which have already stimulated this conviction will stimulate its fuller development. When a man says, "What I have is mine, to be used as I please," this is true only in regard to his legal power. Morally, he holds his wealth as a trust, just as every power or gift; and to deny this is to set at naught the fundamental truth of moral obligation.

For a rich man to live a life of mere idleness and selfish indulgence, without using his surplus for the advancement of the public good or the benefit of others, is to fly in the face of the first principles of morality, to say nothing of the positive precepts of the religion of Jesus. This is so obvious that we believe the time will come, if it has not already dawned, when a life of mere personal gratification and idleness on the part of the rich will be regarded as ignoble, and that the man or woman who has no higher aim than self—whatever the social position—must take a low place in the moral world, and fall in the estimation of the better class of people. Such a life has the stamp of meanness and moral degeneracy, and lacks the nobler elements of manhood or womanhood.

The instances are by no means uncommon for a man, after a grasping, miserly life, to leave his accumulation for public objects. Thus in death he recognizes the principle which he has ignored during his life. The moral value of the bequest is also vitiated by the fact that he gives away what he can no longer hold. It also often happens that his bequests are used in a way he would not have them. This proves the wisdom of giving away money before one's death, as Mr. Andrew Carnegie is doing. Recently, in Allegheny City, a part of "the greater Pittsburg," a large public institution, embracing a library, reading and lecture rooms, art gallery, and museum, has been set apart by impressive public services. This will stand as a monument of his munificence and public spirit. It is stated that his public gifts already are more than three millions of dollars. How much better this is than to run the chances of having the will broken or the money wasted and misspent! Enoch Pratt founds his institution in Baltimore, and sees that it is done before he dies. Samuel Tilden bequeaths a large sum for a library in New York City; and his will is contested in court, and, after the expenditure of a large sum of money and time and the risk of losing the whole, the work begins. These cases are impressive reminders of the wisdom, when possible, of a man's being his own executor; and it is pleasant to note that this is now being done more than ever before, and will probably become more common in the future.

To see the possessor of wealth during his or her life using it to make the lives of others sweeter and brighter, to aid those institutions which alleviate suffering, lessen poverty, ignorance, and crime, is to call forth the esteem and love of mankind.

To avoid firing into the air, and to shoot at a specific point, we would make a special application to the aid and support of religious institutions. To be still more specific, take, for example, the Unitarian body. As expressed in the words and action of the last two National Conferences, the conviction has dawned and been expressed that Unitarians have a mission which is not of their own seeking, but is God-given. If this body has any reason for existence, it is because God has given them a special work to do. The executive officers who have looked over the ground assure us that the time is ripe for a vigorous policy, that the soil is prepared in various parts of our land for the sowing of the seeds of this gospel. The opportunities are open for a larger and grander work in the establishment of new churches, the scattering the truths broadcast by tract, newspaper, and the living word. To aid in this work, the officers of the Association make an appeal to all, and especially to those who are able of their abundance to give on a much larger scale than heretofore. This call should receive a hearty response. What nobler object can present itself to the generous mind than to give freely and largely for the advancement of true religion, which holds in its keeping the dearest human interests, affecting alike the welfare of society and the happiness and uplift of the individual soul!

Musings.

Of all the bequests which Christmas has made to art or music, Handel's "Messiah" is one of the grandest. Struck off at a white heat, it is one of the finest examples of musical inspiration. Nordan might have some ground for accusing this age of degeneracy if it grew tired of "The Messiah." But choral societies do not tire of it, nor do audiences. It is a work in which the choral part is supreme, though the solo singers have their share of opportunity. There are not a great number of soloists, however, who can sing Handel's music effectively, with the demand which it makes upon flexibility, range, breadth, and dramatic fervor. Bach, Liszt, Saint-Saëns, and others of less repute have written Christmas oratorios. Bach's, with its exquisite pastoral symphony, beautiful chorals, its slumber-song, and its joyful choruses, has been given in part several times in this country. But nothing of later origin has taken a deep hold upon popular feeling and reverence. It is one of the great achievements of musical genius that such a grand composition as Handel's should be so popular. That Nestor of musical critics but lately passed away, John S. Dwight, wrote six years ago an article for these columns on "Christmas Music," in which he said of "The Messiah": "An inspired tone-creation, if there ever was one, it has influenced the hearts and minds of men more than all the Christian music of the ages, whether great or small, artistic or rude, commonplace or vulgar. . . . It always draws a crowded audience; and there are hundreds of people, not otherwise much interested in music, who never fail, if possible, to hear 'The Messiah' at Christmas. It has become an act of religious commemoration, and appeals to the pious instincts of generation after generation, as well as the musical taste and culture of those who know most of what is good, enduring, and uplifting in the productions of the art of music." These words are still true and the fact that every seat in Music Hall is already engaged for the oratorio this year proves that this "act of religious commemoration" will be loyally observed.

It has been left for a Boston musical critic—if "critic" is the proper designation—to discover that the choruses of "The Messiah" are not joyful, and therefore should not be joyfully rendered, coupled with the suggestion that the oratorio be given but once in ten years. If that had been written by a deaf-mute, it would at least be explicable. But we venture to say that Helen Keller, blind, deaf, and dumb as she is, could not have written anything about "The Messiah" so wide of the mark as this bit of studied cynicism in the Boston Herald. May Lupercus protect the shepherds who watch their flocks on Christmas Eve against the tooth of such gnawing prejudice! Handel's "Messiah" not joyful! Of the three parts of "The Messiah" one is devoted to the passion; and this is appropriately tender, sad, and beautiful. But the other two parts are essentially triumphal. Of the numbers in the first part, —twenty-one in all,—all but one of them may be said to be distinctly joyful in subject and treatment; and, of the fourteen numbers in the third part, all are triumphal. The second part, beginning in subdued sadness, soon passes into a higher atmosphere of resignation, uttering its joy in "Lift up your heads, O ye gates!" and culminating with the "Hallelujah Chorus."

WE wonder why it is that the perfectly intelligent, just, and learned musical critic is such a rare bird. There are those who know too little, and there are those who know too much. Some like to parade their knowledge, and others their ignorance; while others, whose musical knowledge none can deny, seem to be incapable of appreciating anything beyond the narrow range of their sympathy. It is quite likely that, if they had heard the original symphony of the pastoral angels, they would have criticised it as not being written on principles of modern harmony or as lacking in a desirable spice of deviltry. Mr. W. F. Apthorp, who has well stated the canons of musical criticism, says its chief aim is "to raise the standard of musical performance and popular musical appreciation. To my mind criticism should be nothing but an expression of enlightened opinion,—as enlightened as possible, but never dogmatic. What the critic knows is valuable to himself mainly: it is what he thinks and feels that is valuable to others; and it is extremely important that the public who read criticism should know with whom they have to deal." If the public always knew with whom it dealt, it would place much less value upon the thoughts, and still less upon the feelings, of so-called critics who mask their prejudices under the impersonality of the daily press.

Brevities.

Merry Christmas!

Though we do not approve of hanging, we make an exception when it comes to the Christmas stocking.

A decision of the Supreme Court in North Carolina will put a stop to raffling at church fairs in that State.

If all who are planning to give Christmas presents would divide the money laid aside for this purpose, giving half to those they love and half to the Red Cross for the Armenian sufferers, to whom the words "Merry Christmas!" must seem a cruel mockery, Miss Clara Barton would have the gladdest day of any one in the land.

We have purposely withheld the name of prison and State in which the prisoner is confined who writes the article on "A Christmas in Prison." His history is a very interesting one. We see in this instance how the immortal and spiritual Easter hope—the resurrection to true manhood—may be blended with Christmas cheer even in prison.

The Unitarian Sunday School Association of Concord, N.H., offers to any Unitarian Sunday-school or society several dozen copies of "The Sunday School Service Book and Hymnal," "compiled and edited by Rev. Henry G. Spaulding." These books are in good condition, and will be sent to any one who is willing to pay cost of transportation. Address Rev. Frank L. Phalen.

The common expression, "Merry Christmas to all!" must be modified in many a community. There are homes where the holidays will bring no merry-making. The vacant chair at the table suggests only the sorrow and loneliness of the empty heart. Yet grief, if borne unselfishly, may put aside its own weight of woe, and be glad that to the great multitude Christmas Day may be a day of joy.

Our Roman Catholic contemporary, the Pilot, makes an earnest appeal in behalf of the Armenians: "Boston, as usual, has come forward with an appeal which will be found in another column. It is one which should meet with a prompt and generous response. The Pilot will gladly receive and forward any subscriptions to that good object. There is nothing sectarian about the movement. The Armenian sufferers are Christians,—Catholic, Protestant, and Greek. They are our brethren, and their distress appeals to our common humanity."

A religious exchange has a new department called "The Kodak at Conference: Snap-shots at the Men who did the Talking." One would rather like to see the victim of the shot who is thus delineated: "S. S.—A spiritual soda-fountain, with the latest attachments. If you don't see what you want, ask for it: a comforting chocolate, a stimulating cup of coffee, the finest tea brewed while you wait; a cool limeade, heavily charged with carbon-dioxid gas to give it zest; a good lunch, a toothpick, a pleasant after-dinner feeling to go away with."

Pro and Con.

JOHNSON, NOT BEECHER.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The original hero of the story which you quote in the Register of December 5 from the Universalist as applied to Dr. Edward Beecher was Dr. Samuel Johnson. Dr. Johnson spat out some boiling hot pudding on his plate, with the remark, "A fool would have swallowed it." H. D. S.

THE TURK AT HOME.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The quality of "bumptiousness," which Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith so lavishly bestows upon American missionaries in Turkey, seems to me an important element in his own composition. In his own opinion, he is very much of a Daniel. His strictures upon the missionaries have been ably answered by "Ashmont," "Calcutta," and other writers, including the versatile staff of the Register. There may be an honest difference of opinion among our various religious denominations as to the methods employed by some of our missionaries in foreign countries. That they are adversely criticised by educated men in those countries is in evidence, a notable instance in a letter of a Japanese having recently appeared in your columns. Discussion, however, with a man of Mr. Smith's mental build seems supererogatory, because by his sweeping diatribes he has put himself outside the pale of rational argument. Therefore, though I might desire, I should hesitate to cross swords with him on the religious issue. But there are two misstatements of Mr. Smith's which I would like to correct; and a residence of nearly three months in Constantinople gives me, I think, the ability so to do. These refer to the Turk's cleanliness and his humane treatment of animals. First, as to his statement about Turks, donkeys, and dogs, in which he displays a "fellow feeling" that is "wondrous kind"! There are few merchandise conveyances in Constantinople; and goods of all description are carried on pack-saddles or in panniers. As a matter of fact, donkeys play a very unimportant part as beasts of burden in that city. The animal, which staggers through its streets under a mountainous load of cord-wood, hay, building material, etc., is a small, ill-bred, ill-fed, ill-treated apology for a horse: it would rank as a large pony in this country. The creature is mercilessly overloaded, and is goaded and pinched along by its brutal driver. The passenger vehicles are small victorias, or, more properly speaking, voitures, such as are common in Paris. Visitors usually prefer walking on account of poor pavements and rough roads. When a visit to a distant point is necessary, one must employ this vehicle. The driver of the animal—which is a horse, and not a donkey—thrashes and belabors as much speed as is possible out of the wretched creature; and the air resounds with his cry of "Oosh! Oosh!" to warn the dogs off the road. If the dogs get out of the way, well and good. If not, they are run over; and there are scores of broken-legged, broken-backed dogs which show that this fate has befallen them. These are not even mercifully put to death: the Turk's fatalism and superstition forbid that. So they drag out a miserable existence, till a more merciful wheel runs over a more vital part. The driver who stopped his team and tenderly lifted a dog out of the road rather than run over him was, presumably, "playing to the gallery," in which Mr. Smith was a receptive spectator! When driving in Constantinople, I often implored my dragoman to command the driver to stop lashing his horse; and more than once I threatened to take the whip away from him. On one occasion, when driving to Yildiz, we overtook a drove of horses laden with building material for the Kiosk, then being erected near the palace. Our driver deliberately drove his horse against one of the poor brutes, which was struggling to get out of the way, and, in doing so, ran the wheel over the animal's heel. Maddened by the sight of the pain which the poor creature plainly showed, I seized the driver by the throat, and was on the point of pitching him off his seat, when the dragoman interposed.

I wonder if Mr. Smith ever sat in the rooms of Hotel d'Angleterre, and watched the flocks of sheep driven each morning up the steep, side street from the pens in Galata, for a day's browsing on the barren, sandy hills beyond Pera. If so, he would have seen a panting, bleating, footsore flock goaded along by their inhuman shepherds, and accompanied by two or more horses with empty pack-saddles. And he might have seen the same limping flock returning at evening, minus those which had fallen by the way, but which, with their throats cut, were loaded upon the backs of the attendant horses.

Perhaps Mr. Smith never had these experiences, perhaps he resolutely shut his eyes to them, or perhaps his idea of humane treatment of dumb animals and mine may differ.

About the filthy habits of the Turks as a race I had intended to write, and to mention instances to prove my statements; but perhaps I would better not. Quantum sufficit. You who have had a Constantinople experience can doubtless corroborate all that I have said.

It strikes me very forcibly that Mr. Smith, before again submitting statements to the "cold permanence of print," would better ponder well the remark of the late Mr. Joshua Billings: "It is better not to know so much than to know so many things that ain't so." TERTIUS.

For the Christian Register.

A BETHLEHEM TOWN.

BY REV. JOHN M. SCOTT.

A Bethlehem town my heart would be,
Above it angels singing,
Within it born the dear Christ-child,
The love of heaven bringing;
My soul a Mary's holy breast
To bless the homeless stranger,
Who comes to bless my sinful earth
That greets him with a manger.

My wisest thoughts bend the knee,
In costliest gifts adoring;
My shepherd loves come from their hills,
Their hearts in psalms outpouring;
Until with these and Mary's arms
There is most royal greeting,
For heaven's holiest soul and mine
In such a loving meeting.

Yet Herod seeks to kill my Christ,
The first of many sorrows,
That lurk in every frowning face
Through all my earth's to-morrows,
Until at last upon the cross
My cruel sinning nails him,
The Mary of my soul pierced through,
As, loving, she bewails him.

Yet Easter dawns from out that night,
And shows him ever-living,
A higher holiness of love
To all my wide earth giving;
The angel hymn at last fulfilled,
My heart and God's heart blending,
My soul transfigured with the Christ
In love and life unending.

Dear Love, who such a Bethlehem
Hast sent in holy dreaming,
Awaken all my deepest heart
Till it be more than seeming;
That I a living Christ may know
To give him all my being,
That more and more in me thy face
Its other face is seeing.

That more and more thy Christmas love
Be everywhere fulfilling,
No inmost, outmost earth of man
But blossoms to thy willing;
No Herod anywhere enthroned,
Nor hate nor cross appalling,
Just Mary love and shepherd psalms
To one another calling.

THE GIFT AND THE GIVER.

BY ALICE W. ROLLINS.

"Our Christmas gifts are, for the most part, barbarous, dull, and cold, because they do not represent ourselves. Then let the farmer give his corn, the sailor his shells, the artist his picture, and the poet his poem." This from Emerson is one of the remarks that at first strike one as admirable, but prove, on close examination, to have merely a literary value. How very embarrassing it would be if in actual fact on Christmas morning the farmer should drive up with his load of corn, and the sailor with some of those awful shells only to be seen on the front parlor mantel-pieces or decorated dooryards of very remote villages! Suppose the man willing to give even the devil his due should inadvertently take us for the devil; or that the benevolent individual who "gave to misery (all he had) a tear" should insist on coming to weep it out upon our shoulder! We should not so much mind the artists giving us their pictures; but it is safe to say that, on this coming Christmas, we shall not receive so much as a poster from one of them, in these days when a picture to illustrate a story commands a greater price than the story it illustrates. As for poems, of course it is a comfort to be able to take our complete works to a friend when our enemy will not buy them; but how much better it would be if the friend would buy them beforehand, and let us purchase for him something else from the profits!

And yet, as is usual with the sententious expression of literary half-truths, there is both a good idea and a false one in Emerson's advice. It is a good idea that gifts should express something of the relation between the giver and the givee, so that you shall know at once what you mean to present to sister Julia or Miss Harriman, and not float at random on that terrible sea of "something for my wife" which is the distracted husband's last appeal to the inappreciative clerk, who, perhaps, is not even married to any one, and certainly not to any one of the precise tastes of Mrs. Distracted. But the false element in the idea lies in the assertion that the gift should express the giver. Not at all. He gives twice who gives you what you want, and not what he himself likes. There is a certain picturesqueness in the practical carrying out of the corn-and-shell idea which actually prevails even now at the tithing-place of the Mormons, where each person does pay his taxes in the commodity he happens to have. And yet, while it was impossible not to be touched at the sight of so much individual and personal interest, I confess that even in Salt Lake City I was quite sure I should rather purchase my lettuce, and even the potatoes, from the regular shops. A quart of stringed beans or a dozen tomatoes looked so much more jaded from their journey to the tithing-place than would a bushel or a barrel where companionship kept them fresher from the sun and better protected from the dust. "What you want is sometimes so much better for you than something better!" said once a philosopher. Stevenson expressed the right spirit of giving when he said, "I don't care much myself about thistles; but, if any donkey does, I'm delighted to use my jack-knife in his behalf." True, if your friend wants the Century Dictionary or the Encyclopædia Britannica or the earth, it is not always possible for you to give it to him, even at a sacrifice of your personal tastes; but there are times when you have given most because you gave up giving what you wanted to give. "I shall get Marion 'The Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire,' said a thoughtful brother to his mother just before Christmas. "I wouldn't," was her advice. "You know she doesn't like heavy reading; and she does like pretty things for her dress or her new house, now that she is just engaged. Do get her something for her house!"

"No, mother: the 'Empire' ought to be in every house, whether she likes it or not, and I shall get it for her; and, if she exchanges it for anything else, I'll never make her another present as long as she lives." So, to this day, the elegantly bound and expensive volumes are reposing on her bookshelves; and she tries to love her brother just as well. In a different spirit was the gift of flowers at a recent funeral. "I thought you didn't like set pieces," said an acquaintance to the friend of the family who had sent a floral pillow. "I don't," was the reply; "but I knew that they did. For my own funeral I would have loose lilies; but for theirs I sent what I knew would please them best." Is there really any greater pleasure in life than to give your boy or girl some exquisitely silly thing that you know they crave? Of course, it mustn't be a harmful thing; but, if they want a new tennis-racket which they don't need, or a football which you dread to have them enjoy, or a bangle which you think very poor taste in comparison with a book of engravings, you are a cruel, cruel parent if you insist on giving them engravings. "This is my Christmas present to my husband," said a good lady recently, exhibiting some exquisitely embroidered centre-pieces that she had bought for her dinner table! I must have looked disapproval, for she half apologized. "He likes to have things nice when we have company," she explained. Of course he did; but, as they were extremely wealthy, they could have purchased at any time the most expensive table ornaments, and the gift lost the pretty significance it might have had if they had been poor, and if she had done the embroidery herself. What would she have thought if her husband had presented her with a fine box of cigars to be laid away for company, because she liked to have the gentlemen satisfied when they came to dinner?

Ah, yes! there is a science in giving. But be sure, even when you have decided on giving Julia what she wants, that she will appreciate, not only getting it, but getting it from you. Arthur Donnithorne gave Hetty what she wanted,—the lovely pearl and garnet ear-rings; but one of George Eliot's light touches went to the secret of the matter when she wrote: "No, she was not thinking most of the giver when she smiled at the ear-rings; for she is taking them out of the box, not to press them to her lips, but to fasten them in her ears." Assure yourself, when you think with pleasure of eyes that will dance at sight of your gift, that it will be pressed first to the lips, wherever it may be worn later.

But remember that gifts are to express love, never to win it. Even devotion palls upon a woman, when it is merely a lavishing, and not a claim. "I will devote my whole life to making you happy," said the conventional lover to the Princess Osra; but she touched a wonderful spring of human nature, when she answered, at once haughtily and wistfully: "Thank you, but I don't wish you to make me happy: I can make myself happy. What my lover must tell me is that I make him happy, and without trying to." Kate Douglas Wiggin touches the same spring in a humbler individual when she makes the poor, neglected New England housewife explain that Joe doesn't come home early, and bring in her wood and water, but that he brings back such good stories and good humor from the tavern, and is so pleased with all she has done that he ought to have done, that she likes him a heap better than if he were merely attentive. Ah! that is the secret, gentlemen! You may go to the club occasionally, if you will only come home after it pleasant.

What shall we give? It is sometimes a wearing problem; but, oh, be sure and give something! If you are very poor, give little jokes, like the happy family whose Christmas-tree was the hat-tree, hung with greens and small things made out of paper and ingenuity. Of all things, do not aim to save yourselves trouble, and at the same time avoid hurting other people's feelings by agreeing beforehand, as I have known even some very rich people to do, to "pair off," and "suppose we don't give each other things this year, but just let the children exchange." I really think this cold-blooded suggestion the worst of all. And do not forget to look over things you do not want, but that somebody else may. I have heard it ridiculed when anybody gave away what they did not want themselves; but, in reality, such things are just as valuable gifts as any, provided the person they are given to does happen to want them. Moreover, let everybody know how busy you are, and how much you are going to give. Announce even your charities; for "let not your left hand know" means only "let not your own left hand know." Do not boast, but simply let other people's left hands feel a gentle squeeze, and be conscious of a quiet reminder to let their right hands go and give something, too. The silent giver only half gives: the thing to his friend, the pleasure to himself; but he who tells may inspire, since as Shakspeare hath it,—

"One good deed, dying tongueless, Slaughters a thousand, waiting upon that."

No: be not afraid to give, either out of your abundance or your poverty, remembering the epitaph of the Duke of Devonshire:—

"What I spent I had;
What I saved I lost;
What I gave I have."

CHRISTMAS DAY REFLECTIONS.

BY HON. NOAH DAVIS.

If Jesus of Nazareth were now living on our earth, he would on this day have seen eighteen hundred and ninety-five of his own birthdays; and, with the recurrence, he would have seen, year by year, the wonderful changes and events of our revolving world. He would have seen man's new discoveries of the vaster worlds, parts of his Father's universe, and of the inflexible laws that hold and guide them obedient in their majestic orbits.

He would have seen the birth, growth, and death of new nations, new dynasties, vast kingdoms, great republics, and mighty empires. He would have seen the destruction of that Jerusalem that "accepted him not," and the scattering of her children all over the earth as a great people without a land, at length finding their safest home in our land, and beneath the shadow of his wing. He would have seen the fall of the Rome whose officers condemned him to the cross without a fault, and the rise and power of another Rome, claiming in his name to hold the keys of heaven and to sway the conscience of mankind.

He would have seen the long and fearful struggle of Christian and Saracen over the possession of his own tomb; the age of chivalry and the degradation of serfdom; the invention of gunpowder, by which the serf rose slowly to his manhood; the ignorance of the Dark Ages; the revival of learning and the conquests of science; the wane of superstition; the exaltation of his religion and the elevation by it of the masses of mankind; the aggrandizement of thrones and their destruction; the discovery of new continents; the founding therein of new states, new empires, and new republics; the birth of new liberty and new ideas of the rights of man, and the consequent elevation of manhood; the marvellous triumphs of mind over matter; the innumerable inventions of genius in the mastery of steam; the subjugation of electricity; the conquest of time and distance; the growth of philosophy; the victories of medicine in the arrest and palliation of pestilence and disease; the triumphs of surgery in the relief of human suffering; the elevation of all the humanities devoted to the knowledge and happiness of man; the administration of justice in new and better ways; the growth of charity in all her sweet and beautiful forms; the elevation of woman in all her rights, powers, and influences, with the sure promise of her just equality of rights before the law.

All these he would have seen; and in them he would see the spirit and power of the holy religion he founded as the greatest and truest operating cause in all our world's advancement, and in the growth of man in the wisdom and virtue that insure the equality of rights of conscience and of liberty to all men.

But Jesus of Nazareth is not here in the form in which he once walked the earth. But on this his birthday we own, with joy, the power, the beauty, and the holiness of his religion, and the universal blessing it has been to all the races of mankind.

New York City.

CHRISTMAS DAYS IN PRISON.

BY A PRISONER.

All the world keeps holiday at Christmas-tide, the "shut-in" as well as the "shut-out," together with all who have full liberty. The writer has spent Christmas Day in two prisons,—once, many years ago, in a now famous Southern prison, where the incarcerated were by far the most jubilant, and the prison guards depressed and gloomy. For the Federal troops were gaining all along the line, and the poor Confederacy felt the coil daily tightening about her. With little to eat, without the common comforts of life, half-clad, and shivering with the biting cold in old Libby Prison, we shouted for very joy, and sang patriotic songs all day and half the night; for was not "Old Glory" forging its way with Sherman to the sea, and old "U. S." and our own comrades of the Army of the Potomac thundering away almost at the very gates of Richmond? What were hunger and cold and nakedness in the face of such good news? And then—there was no disgrace attended with incarceration in Libby Prison.

Alas! the Christmas Day spent in that other—a Northern prison—is attended with sore remorse and sad disgrace.

Outwardly Christmas is spent in prison very much as it is spent outside. True, the greetings are more subdued; yet they seem to carry the fraternal wishes more seriously, I think more earnestly and feelingly. Breakfast comes an hour later than upon working days, and brings to the prisoner some extras,—fruit, eggs, a bit of cheese, or other dainties. An hour or so after breakfast the entire prison is marched to the chapel, or main auditorium; and a choice entertainment is witnessed. Of course, the Roman Catholics have had their early mass, no service, however, being held for the Protestants. Then, returning from the chapel, the men are given the freedom of the yard for an hour or two of air, exercise, and visiting; and good use is made of the time. A prison community differs but little in its main features from the community at large outside. Acquaintances are made, friendships are formed, and attachments in some cases become very strong; and so this time in the yard is improved for social intercourse, the exchange of gifts, and such other matters as prevail elsewhere.

From the yard, at 12 M., the men are marched to the kitchen slide, or window, where they receive their dinner. This is usually extra at all prisons. The dinner in this prison is excellent, including the proverbial "English pudding." From the kitchen slide the men are marched to their cells, and are locked up for the remainder of the day. It is here in their lonely cells during the long hours of the afternoon and evening that the prisoner's real Christmas is spent. Some receive boxes of good things from the friends outside. The more fortunate receive visits from loved ones, and by these and many other things one's thoughts are likely to be turned back to the happy Christmases of other times.

The writer's thoughts have turned naturally to the time when his own life was happy, and seemed at least to be useful to God and fellow-man. In the quiet of his iron-barred room the still, small voice has spoken to him, not only of the past and the dear ones who once peopled his little world, but also of the future and the struggle required to redeem his shameful present. Nor are these utterances without promises of hope for that future, so that, while corporally within prison walls, imagination and spirit have carried him both backward and forward until he is miles and months away from cell No. —. During those hours of self-communion one of the many conclusions forced upon him has been that a term in prison need not be all loss, but that actual and lasting gain may come of it.

In confinement the thoughtless and shallow-minded sleep much of their leisure time away, and so go out, when released, ill fitted to take up the struggle of life again. Prison walls, however, shut in many who are earnest and thoughtful. Though fallen into crooked ways, they do not intend to return to those ways again. The latter occupy themselves quite differently. Reading of every kind is furnished from the prison library. Text-books for study may be had for the asking, and others pass the long hours in useful labor. Many of those one meets in prison are busy "making something"; and, generally, it is something requiring patience, skill, and close application upon the worker's part. Many lessons, but two great and important ones, may be learned in prison; namely, obedience and patience. And the sooner a prisoner learns both of these by heart, the more comfortable will be his lot and the less tedious will seem the dragging hours.

The writer fumed and fretted during the earlier months of his confinement, and the authority and regulations seemed irksome and quite unnecessary in his case. But, after his second Christmas Day was ended, he had thoroughly gone over his past life; and, rightly considering the present situation and future hopes and prospects, he concluded that, as in the past, so in the present and future, he and his were in the hands of the Supreme One, and there was nothing left for him to do but to obey and wait. So, beginning right there, the fight went on for months, until victory was his.

The exactions and rules of the prison régime, at first so irritating, became easier than habit when the habit was formed; and the days came and passed, and events happened or not, it made no difference to him. He has reached the restfulness of perfect trust in Providence and patient bearing of all things. Though powerless to protect, or even to assist, the dear loved ones outside, or even to aid them in any way, he has left them with perfect assurance in the hands of the One mightier. Restitution and reparation of injury wrought in the past are for the moment impossible, but he can wait and hope. The future, surely and swiftly nearing, looks dark; but he puts all care away with the hope "That it would brighten as it drew near."

One Christmas afternoon contemplation revealed much to be thankful for. His very arrest seemed a special providence; for by it he was removed from the opportunity to feed the appetite that had led him into crime. The jail became a veritable "Keeley Cure," and, without doubt has saved him from death by alcoholism.

Then incarceration brings a man face to face with himself; and he soon learns what sort of a man he is, fictitious values fall away, and only the real appears, and, if he will let conscience, "sitting alone with him," direct him in the right way, all will be well, and Christmas will become a new birth into salvation of a better life. In the outside world there is so much to see and do that diffusion oft becomes the rule, while prison life brings closest attention and careful concentration of thought and action; and the individual gain is great. Then, again, the writer has found other blessings to be grateful for, among them good health. A prison may become a perfect health resort for an intemperate and self-indulgent person. He will begin to improve from the day he enters. Thoughtful, earnest people become more thoughtful and earnest; and the thoughtless and frivolous often become thoughtful and staid. In a word, if one has lost self-control, lost his rule over his appetites and passions, lost his grip on life even, if the evil that is in him is "on top," a prison then will more likely than otherwise work a cure for him; and the stricter the prison life and the more thorough the discipline, the better it is for the imprisoned, and the more likely is his incarceration to work a reform.

So, while the Christmas bells are ringing outside and the world beyond our walls is happy with its joys and carols and gifts, we, the shut-in, are not deprived of all share in these happy things. We are learning lessons of obedience to human as well as divine authority, and patience amid everything likely to tend to impatience and unrest.

"Before I was afflicted, I went astray." Before arrest, I doubtless would have given everything possible to avoid arrest: months later, with health restored and freedom from the burning fever which accompanies intemperance, I did thank God from a full heart for incarceration; for the Great Father alone knew what was best for me. "No chastisement for the present seemeth joyous, but grievous. Nevertheless, afterward it worketh the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them which are exercised thereby." All are not exercised aright by confinement. The writer was not for many months at the first. He was hard and bitter toward former friends, the restraints of prison life were frightfully irksome, and his heart was full of hate and vengeful feelings toward those who had shut him in; but the sweeter things the Christmas carols bring softened his heart, and cheerful patience and willing obedience opened the way for the Christmas joyousness to come in with its "peace on the earth and good will to men," to be followed by the whole troop of "the peaceable fruits."

THE ANGELS' SONG.

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

"Peace on earth, good will to men!" How can we but be glad that such a sentiment, worthy of being sung by angels, was rescued from oblivion, and preserved for us in the forefront of the gospel history? A sentiment so pure and high might well be the saving salt of any legend in which it is contained. And who shall say that it has not been the sentiment that has preserved the legend rather than the legend that has preserved the sentiment? But, whether it has been or not, the sentiment has been preserved; and, though it did not prove prophetic of any immediate change in the habits of individuals or states, I dare believe that by the music of this angel song the hearts of men have been allured to gentler ways than they would otherwise have known, that there would have been still less "peace on earth," still less "good will to men," if the Christian world for nineteen centuries had not been confronted and rebuked by this ideal, however unattained, however unattainable for centuries to come.

But are we any nearer to its attainment now than we were fifty years ago? Chronologically, yes. Practically, no. Then the peace societies were flourishing. But do they flourish now? Then Charles Sumner gave the great oration of his manly youth on "The True Grandeur of Nations"; and there were many who believed on him, though the great thieving expedition into Mexico was already ill begun. Would as many now believe on a young man, of whatever splendid parts, whatever wonderful nobility of face and form, whatever voice of deep-toned melody, who should come thinking such things as Sumner thought in 1845, and saying such things as he said? I doubt it very much. I am not sure that good men should desire to have it so. "In our age," he said, "there can be no peace that is not honorable: there can be no war that is not dishonorable." Could he himself say that in 1861, when the war for union and emancipation was marshalling its rival hosts? Lowell was with him in 1845; but in 1861 he recognized that "the sheathed blade may rust with darker sin." Without shedding of blood there was no remission. Peaceable emancipation, with compensation for every slave, would not have cost one-third as much, to speak of money only, and say nothing of the loss of life and joy and the general entail of misery and crime. But peaceable emancipation was impossible. The South did not wish to sell her "divine institution" for mere sordid cash. And so there had to be another war, and one cannot so pierce the future with his prophetic eye as to affirm that such a situation never can recur.

But what is absolutely certain is that the situations which to the war-like editor and politician mean inevitable war do not mean anything generally but that which wise diplomacy or peaceful arbitration can decide. Hardly could there be a more miserable complication than that of the "Alabama" claims, and yet we got all that we were entitled to without the firing of a shot. So with the Canada fisheries, so with the Bering Sea difficulty. In either case hundreds of editors and politicians did all they could to make a peaceful settlement impossible, and yet the peaceful settlement was brought about.

Nevertheless, it is unquestionable that to be "first in peace" is an ideal which is unsatisfactory to a great many of our people, and it is becoming less and less satisfactory to them every day. We have editors of all dimensions declaring war on several foreign countries at once, senators and representatives elongating the tail of the national coat, and daring now England and now Spain to tread on it, a Congressional chaplain, quick to echo the prevailing sentiment, praying the astonishing prayer, in his name whom we have called the Prince of Peace: "May we be quick to resent anything like an injury to this our nation! . . . So may thy kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven!" One would suppose, to hear the talk of Jingo editors and politicians and many others, seemingly well disposed in their habitual walk and conversation, that war was the greatest fun in the world,—a consummation devoutly to be wished, and that, the more wars we have on hand at once, the better.

Various factors have contributed their several elements to this condition of affairs. Tyros in evolution have stopped short with its first chapters; and, because war was formerly a divinity that rough-hewed the ends of social justice, they assume that it must be looked to for the shaping of them to the finest issues of the present and all coming time. But Herbert Spencer, first among evolutionists, is the most inflexible antagonist of the military spirit in our day. Another factor, and a far more general one, in our fighting temper is the increase of our national strength, and with it the increased consciousness thereof. Here, too, men learn by halves, remembering that it is good to have a giant's strength, forgetting that it is tyrannous to use it like a giant, and especially that crushing pygmies is not a giant's proper work. Another factor is the hope of gain which feeds upon the recollection of the splendid fortunes made by the army contractors of the Civil War, the nation's torn and bloody plumage but an opportunity to feather their own nests. But the principal factor in our altered temper is the idealization of war in the abstract in the light of our great national contest and our glorious victory.

Now is there anything in the history of that contest, and in its subsequent results, that should make war seem any more desirable to us, any less terrible, any less to be avoided, shunned, and hated than if it had never been? It was inevitable. It justified itself. The end crowned the work as right and good; and, horrible as was the killing, glorious was the voluntary sacrifice of life, the dying for one's country, the being killed with sacred joy, if haply so the bonds of the oppressor might be broken and the oppressed go free. And yet the proverb has been made good in our experience which says that every war leaves behind it an army of heroes, an army of cripples, and an army of thieves. So many of our cripples must have been heroes that we may doubt the wisdom of the double entry, but we have also had the thieves. They came down like the Assyrian on the national treasury, and captured Grant's administration by a more subtle strategy than he had encountered on the field of battle. They invaded every form of private business. Another legacy of the contest was the inflation of all business methods, all standards of prosperity. The modest gains of former times no longer satisfied. The bounty money was soon spent; but at the bottom of the purse there was a charm that made lavish expenditure henceforth the habit of the poor. Much of the pension money has no doubt had the same morbid action. And to how many it has gone who had no honest claim on it, while thousands of the more deserving have preferred the "crown of wild olive" to a purse of gold! Where great moral issues are at stake, it may be contemptible to count the cost; but to do so is good instruction for the war-like crew who are going about among us, breathing forth threatenings and slaughter, and taking many foolish people in their snare. The contemporary cost of war is but the smallest part of it. England has recently been doubling her army and navy budget; but a year or two ago our war that ended in 1865 was costing us a good deal more than her war footing. What a drain is here upon the life-blood of the nation! What an enormous bias on our questions of taxation and finance! What a strain upon the health of business enterprise and the common weal! Then, too, we hailed as wonderful and beautiful the melting away of our great army into private life. There, but for the political manager and demagogue, it might have been contented to remain. But, rallied by this pair, arcades ambo, how heavy on our municipal and State and national administration has been its powerful hand!

Could we stop here, there would be nothing in the history and subsequent effects of our great national conflict to make war as such seem any more desirable, any less terrible, any less something to be shunned and hated, and, if possible, avoided, than it was before that grand and awful series of events. But we cannot stop here. Every great war, and every little war in a proportionate degree, means a catalogue of horrors that does not appear in the statement of the national debt nor on the pension roll; nor is there any adequate account of it in the histories and fictitious narratives, trailing which clouds of glory the old wars come down to us along the centuries. The stories and the histories do not go into the details of slaughter,—the shattered limbs, the lacerated flesh, the broken lives, the broken hearts. We do not hear in them the children's crying and the widow's anguished moan. And war means all these things,—a great war the multiplication of them to an unconscionable degree. Only Verestchagin and Wiertz have painted war true to the life,—the death!—and we can hardly look upon their work, and live. It is the same with Tolstoi's "War and Peace." It is nothing to the discredit of Napoleon III. that, when he saw the field of Solferino after the battle, he sickened at the sight, and resolved straightway upon a proclamation of peace.

What are we going to do about it? The fond illusion that industrialism was going to "Ring in the thousand wars of peace" is by this time pretty thoroughly dispelled. Will the perfection of the machinery of war serve us a better turn? The more warships, the more soldiers, the more deadly weapons, the less war! Well, this may be the way out; but, if it is, it is like Jean Valjean's way out of Paris,—by the sewer. It is a foul and hideous way. But it is no way out. If the fear of another nation's armament gives some collective bully, called a nation, pause, the strength of his own armament will make him insolent. It is an axiom of political economy that nations on a war footing are always spoiling for a fight. The soldier and the sailor hate inaction. The officers of our beautiful white cruisers are not satisfied with speed. They want to know their fighting qualities: they want to have a brush. But, if the mighty armaments could bring us peace, it would not be an honorable peace. It would be peace on earth without good will to men,—a pitiful perversion of the angels' song.

The revised translation helps us to a better thought. William Makepeace Thackeray did it no violence when he sang,—

"Be peace on earth, be peace on earth,
To men of gentle will!"

We shall continue to have wars and fightings so long as our communities are made up of captious and contentious people who delight in making trouble, whose doctrine is that every least offence should bear its comment, and that the comment should be as harsh as possible, whose prayer to "the God of all peace" is, daily, "May we be quick to resent anything like an insult to this our nation." But, given a habit of good will in all our personal affairs, and extend this habit to our international affairs,—assuming that there is one moral law for nations and for Christian gentlemen,—and there might be a general disarmament at once. This happy consummation is remote; but in the mean time every one of us can do something in the direction of "the things that make for peace,"—something that will bring us just a little nearer to the hope and promise of the angels' song.

THE CHRISTMAS MESSAGE.

BY JANE SMITH.

Christmas time, the one time of all others universally given up to mirth and innocent joy, ought to be darkened by none of the contrasts that pain us continually throughout the year. It seems as if there were no place for any but happy people at a season when love and good wishes overflow to all mankind. The churches, the stores, the good-natured crowds that throng our streets, the eager children, busy with their planning and their delightful mysteries,—all seem involuntarily to hint of the time when the dream of a universal brotherhood shall work itself out at last in the lives of men.

But we are not all happy. For many of us this first snow that is covering the ground to-day covers, too, the outward form of all that made Christmas dear and fair one short year ago. Many of us have come closer than ever before to a knowledge of the bitter starvation of body and spirit, which holds a part of our fellow-creatures in a bondage unrealized by those more fortunately born and bred. Many of us have had our hearts so torn by the suffering of dear ones in distant countries that it seems wicked to be happy, and the desire to give up comfort and peace to share the danger and the torture is stronger than love for wife or child or adopted home.

Many of us, again, are in the first shock of a terrible awakening to realities of our individual lives, which seem to cloud the future and paralyze our powers of recovery. In the festival which celebrates the birth of Jesus is there any place for him who is so burdened with the sin and sorrow of the world that the calm peacefulness of the saint is as far removed from him as the innocent joy of childhood? What shall we do? The very joy that floods the world about us and the apparent indifference to the close-pressing trouble hurt us with their contrast; and the Christmas sorrow grows until it seems a mockery to call this a true celebration of the birth of One who was a man of sorrows, and whose own tenderness would not have suffered a sparrow to fall to the ground unnoticed nor a lamb to go astray through the night.

The Christmas meaning, though rightfully expressed by merriment and gifts and unusual generosity, nevertheless lies far deeper than these. Its revelations are not alone for the young or the happy. Our hearts may ache with the unspoken longing for the one who was the centre of joy a year ago; but the Christmas message comes to bid us live for the peace that is in the heart of the pain itself. No one knows what that peace is save he who has won it through the suffering; but it is there, and day by day we begin to catch glimpses of it, and it is so wonderful and so much more precious than mere happiness that life is worth living even in loneliness and un-forgotten longing. When the Christ is born in our hearts, we know that such love cannot go to waste, but that, put into selfless service for others, it must deepen and sweeten all the other meanings of life, and that the Christmas thought is more, not less, to us than it could ever have been otherwise.

When we are burdened, too, with new thoughts of the world-sorrow which seems to shame us out of our comfort and ease with reproaches that we do so little to help, the Christmas message may come to us with wholesome, sane correcting. Our moods of despair and bitterness are not the ones in which we do the most to remove the conditions that we weakly lament. It is better to be brave than to be cowardly. The true helper of his fellow-men will put these moods away as temptations, and recognize that those who have done most in the past and are doing most to-day to lift people out of hampering conditions, and to make possible the magnificent dreams of optimists, are men who, like Phillips Brooks, know that "the needed tonic and medicine of the human spirit is a persistent, invincible, and exuberant hopefulness." When the Christ is born in our hearts, we know that to growing, aspiring lives must come inevitably the pain and the self-sacrifice that mean ultimately the highest joy and service. Humanity makes its way through the long centuries from "the peace that brooded over Eden" to that "which crowned Gethsemane," from the low state of personal ends and enjoyments up to the passion of love which is willing to endure defeat and shame in its supreme self-surrender.

Then for that sorrow—most hopeless, perhaps, of all, when opportunities have been wasted and years lost, when we ourselves have kept the heaven away from earth by our follies and mistakes, when life seems to be only the vapor that vanisheth, and when the hurt of a purposeless existence, the stain of ignoble desires, seem to touch through us the lives of those nearest to us,—is there any Christmas message that can yield fresh hope and courage? There must be, else were Jesus born in vain. The Christmas message is one that bids us see the Infinite Right overarching the finite wrong and blundering, even when these are our own. God needs us all, every one of us; and the tenderness and love of Jesus would not be still waiting after these nineteen hundred years for perfect appreciation, had he included only the successful in his beatitudes. A new loyalty awakens in our hearts when we pass beyond the ordinary limitations of our own judgments and see even our own marred, unbeautiful lives in the light of those divine possibilities that he held out so freely to all. God be thanked for the Christmas hope of a new birth! The Christmas message is more than one of temporary good will to men and partial peace on earth; and the Christ-child may be born in our hearts again in new purpose, new, even though chastened, hope, and new aspiration.

THE HUMAN CHRISTMAS.

BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

Not only is Christmas essentially human more than it is Christian, but, at first sight, many of its celebrations seem totally out of place in any dogmatic view of the Christian day. If all the race was lost, and on this day a supernatural being comes into the world to live an outcast life, to suffer and to die, to redeem a part of mankind from an endless hell, it might seem fitting that this part, at least, should offer up a solemn and sad thanksgiving,—solemn, as befits such a dreadful deliverance; sad, because only a part were to share in it. But what have carols and games and gifts, and mummeries and boisterous mirth, and garlands and laughter to do with such a day and such a deliverance?

This, indeed, has always been the view of the more serious part of the Church. Tertullian, one of the most famous of the Church Fathers, declares it to be "rank idolatry to deck their doors with garlands or flowers on festival days, according to the custom of the heathen." Another Church Father, Gregory, protests against it. A church council in France once (614) forbade Christians "to deck their houses with laurel, ivy, and green boughs." More than once in England attempts have been made to abolish the festival, as being a relic of Paganism. If you wish to see how such things were regarded in old New England, read Hawthorne's "May-pole of Merry-Mount." It is only in very modern times that Christmas has had a place in our New England churches and homes. When the Puritans came to this country, they hoped they had left this behind as a pagan corruption of popery, which itself was as bad as Paganism, if not worse. In that part of New England where I was born, it was practically unknown. I never received a Christmas gift in all my boyhood, and do not remember a case of anybody's else receiving one.

Instead, then, of Christmas originating with Christianity, its spirit and genius are foreign to it. It is human, not dogmatic. Supernatural dogmatism has never taken kindly to it. It has flourished best where human, natural sympathies have had freest scope. Its universal prevalence to-day coincides with and indicates the decay of dogmatism and the flourishing development of the humanities.

We come back, then, now for a moment to our old question, Why did the Church select this day, already universally celebrated, as the birthday of Jesus? The answer is, Just because it was already universally celebrated. Listen to Saint Chrysostom: "On this day the birth of Christ was lately fixed in Rome, in order that, while the heathen were busied with their profane ceremonies, the Christians might perform their holy rites undisturbed." The simple fact is here. The Church found this day a universal festival, fast fixed in the hearts of the people. They could not uproot it. They then took the more practical course of adopting and rechristening it. They took it whole, with all its features and ceremonies unimpaired. Only they put new meanings into the old customs and sought Christian symbols in the pagan rites.

But do these facts make it any the less rational for us to accept and use the day? Rather, the very contrary of this seems to me to be true. It comes to us with all the gifts and joy and hope of all the ages. The gentleness of Christ and the humanity of all our forefathers look out of its eyes. Whether with human and natural or Christian interpretation, it is still the day of the birth of light and genial warmth. Its garlands and evergreens are the new life of spring, the life that only dies to be perpetually reborn, extemporized in the darkest hour of winter. It is human hope always forestalling reality, always believing in the coming of better days. The framework of Christian dogma is only temporary: it is put up, it will be taken down; but the building of human hope and joy will rise still in ever grander proportions. The Christian dogma is only a passing fashion in which humanity clothes itself. The dress will wear out, and the eternal Worker will weave a new; but the living child of God—his one child, man—will grow in stature and beauty. This Christian dogma, called orthodox, can be paralleled almost completely in ancient Egypt, and also in the Buddhist faith. Both have the virgin birth, the human mother, the superhuman father, and the whole cycle of rite and ceremony that make up the outward form of the Church. All these things pass and change. But the human hope and faith and joy that are the life of our Christmas time,—these "spring eternal in the human breast."

But, after all, is there no peculiarly Christian significance in our Christmas Day? Most certainly there is. And most certainly we, who care for humanity more than for any sectarian name, and who believe that Christ was a product of and wrought for humanity,—we can, least of all, afford to overlook the significance and glory of his work.

However perverted the record and meaning of that wondrous life may have been, it is still true that it marks the advent into human history of a new and higher ideal. It is an epoch in the upward progress of the race. The old Christmas meant the birth of light and warmth and joy. So Jesus, freed from the dogmatism with which harsh and cruel centuries have clothed him, stands for the light of trust in man and God, for the warmth of charity and good will, and for the joy of those who receive help, and the greater joy of those who give it.

But, preceding all this, including it, and in its permanent elements, what is it that our human Christmas means? Recur for one moment to its origin. It was the birthday of the sun. That meant the death of the darkness and the cold, and the far-off coming of the gladsome spring, with flowers and birds and rippling waters and bursting buds. Do you not see the old parable, ever new and fresh as the blue skies of May? It is the parable of human hope. As the old poets have sung it, when Eden was lost, when the peaceful and happy reign of Saturnus had passed away, when discord and murder and war had driven Peace and Mercy back to their native heaven, Hope remained true to men:—

"Hope, the charmer, lingered still behind."

Christmas, then, is the festival of that faith that, in the midst of present ill, describes the far-off features of the coming good. Through the snow-storm it sees June. Above the howling blasts of December it hears bird-songs. Beneath the snow it sees the thrill of seed and root that promise harvests. Across the storm-cloud of war it sees the bow of peace. Surrounded by squalid poverty, it describes the dim outlines of a time when man shall no more hunger. It hears the wail of sorrow and crime swell and change to a psalm of triumph and a song of thanksgiving. Thus it is that Christmas, shutting her eyes to the present and opening them on the "good time coming," sings her glad carols, decks herself with garlands, trims her doorways with green, and makes real to our heart and our hope the coming era of light and love and joy.

And, when she opens her hands and makes glad the children and the poor by her gifts, she prefigures the extinction of selfishness and the coming kingdom of perfect "good will toward men." Selfishness is not the desire of good things. This is right and natural to every human heart. It is only that disregard of the rights and happiness of others that is willing to take its good things at the expense of evil and injury to some one else. There is enough of all things in the world to-day to make the whole world happy, if only this fiend of selfishness were once destroyed. It is the death of this the one great happiness-killer of the world that the gift-giving and taking of Christmas prefigures and prophesies. We shall hasten the coming of that day, then, just in so far as we try to make the Christmas spirit pervade the whole year.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

DIRECTORS' MEETING.

The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, December 10. There were present Mrs. Hooper, Mrs. Talbot, Mrs. Wells, and Mrs. Williams, and Messrs. Batchelor, Brown, Butler, Dole, S. A. Eliot, Fox, Hosmer, Howe, Little, Lyman, Savage, Stone, and Wells. Mr. Lyman took the chair in the absence of the president.

The treasurer made the following statement for November, 1895:—

INCOME.
Cash on hand, November 1.....	$28,527.80
From donations and legacies.....	6,467.42
From other sources.....	780.84
	$35,776.06
EXPENDITURES.
For missionary work.....	$6,244.93
For book department, expenses, etc.....	918.82
Cash on hand.....	28,612.31
	$35,776.06

The above shows only the operations for the month of November. It does not show the actual condition of the treasury December 1. On December 1 the Association owed for borrowed money the sum of $21,665.92 that does not show at all in the above statement.

Rev. D. W. Morehouse, superintendent for the Middle States, explained the needs of churches asking for aid in his department; and, on recommendation of the Committee on the Middle States, the following appropriations were made for the year beginning Jan. 1, 1896: to the First Unitarian Society, Ithaca, N.Y., $1,500; to the Reformed Christian Church, Trenton, N.Y., $300; to the First Unitarian Society, Plainfield, N.J., $500; to the First Congregational Society, Vineland, N.J., $300; to the Church of Our Father, Newburg, N.Y., $400; to the First Unitarian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., $300; to the First Unitarian Church, Hamilton, Ont., Can., $500; to the Unitarian Society, Passaic, N.J., $300; to the First Unitarian Society, Albany, N.Y., $1,500; for new missionary work, $200; for one-half the salary of Rev. D. W. Morehouse, superintendent for the Middle States, $1,250.

On recommendation of the Committee for the Middle West it was voted to grant to the First Unitarian Society, Winona, Minn., for six months, $200; for Post-office Mission work of Rev. John S. Brown, $50.

On recommendation of the Committee on Education, $300 from the income of the Perkins Fund was appropriated for the benefit of the Beneficiary Fund of the Meadville Theological School.

The remainder of the afternoon was spent in a discussion of the general aspects of our work in various parts of the country. While no immediate and definite results were reached, a lively desire was manifested to begin the new year with operations which would improve the quality and increase the influence of our work. The secretary was warmly seconded in his plan of reaching the centres of influence by his personal presence. Missionary conventions will be arranged for, and new efforts made to spread our literature and deepen our influence and enlarge our constituency. Due notice was taken of the fact that for work done during the present fiscal year more than $21,000 has been borrowed, and that less than six months remain in which to receive the income adequate to our expenses.

GEORGE BATCHELOR,
Sec'y.

Spiritual Life.

Jesus will always supply us with the best criticism of Christianity; and, when Christianity has passed away, the religion of Jesus will in all probability survive. After Jesus as God, we shall come back to faith in the God of Jesus.—Amiel.

As the birth of Jesus ushered in new dreams of love and good will between man and man, so let the recurring festival renew in our hearts tender thoughts of service to others, seeking with one accord to bring the kingdom of heaven upon the earth.—Selected.

Jesus Christ belonged to the true race of prophets. . . . Alone in all history he estimated the greatness of man. One man was true to what is in you and me. He saw that God incarnates himself in man, and evermore goes forth to take possession of his world.—R. W. Emerson.

The life of Jesus is wrought ineffably into the higher civilization, the nobler social conceptions. . . . We are what we are largely because a Galilean peasant was born and grew to manhood, and preached and loved and died. Granted that the true story of Jesus of Nazareth was from the beginning obscured by error and mistake; granted that those errors and mistakes which were once the strength of Christianity are now its weakness, and are threatening, unless we can clear them away, to lessen the hold of Jesus on the love and remembrance of man. The fact is merely a call to you and me, who recognize it, to go back to the roots of things, to reconceive the Christ, to bring him afresh into our lives, to make the life so freely given for man minister again in new ways to man's new needs.—Mrs. Humphry Ward.

The Sunday School.

The Channing Hall "Talks," in charge of Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, will be omitted next Saturday, December 21. The Sunday-schools as a whole will be engrossed on the following Sunday in Christmas exercises. Mr. Pulsford will resume his interesting addresses on December 28.

The following paragraph from the Cheerful Letter contains a pleasant word about our paper for young people:—

"You cannot fully realize what a great blessing it has been to this backwoods settlement to get reading matter, and every paper that comes here is read and reread until worn out. I want more especially to thank the Sunshine Club for the Every Other Sunday. The children will wade the creeks and break the ice to get the paper. Mrs. Zara L. Cotton, Mt. Ida, Ark."

The list of acknowledgments in last week's Register from individual donors shows the kind interest which many take in the work of the Unitarian Sunday School Society. There never was a time when money could do so much through the channel of this organization for spreading our principles and perpetuating our form of belief. The manuals of the Sunday School Society comprehend the broadest and most permanent phases of liberal thought. They are also full of the modern spirit of ethical training and character-making. Those who have our cause at heart can do no better than to assist the Unitarian Sunday School Society in laying the foundations for a broader and nobler religious faith among the young people.

There is probably no greater opportunity given to Sunday-school teachers for enforcing the cardinal principles of Christianity than through the Christmas observances. All Christendom blends together at that time. Young and old break down artificial walls, and unite in one happy interpretation of the mission of Jesus. Music, Christmas-trees, appropriate talks, joint services in the church, gifts for the poor, and the bringing together of all elements in a church ought to give new life and nobler spirit to organized religion. Christmas appeals to the individual, who, in turn, freshly inspired, imparts loftier motives to the work which he does in common with others. Christmas, we repeat, is the grand opportunity of the year for bringing Jesus back into the Christianity which so often misunderstands him. It is not simply, we would note, that the world is made more genial and joyous by the Christmas observance, but churches themselves are freshly Christianized, and made to see what their duties are in this struggling world. By all means, let us have in the Unitarian churches and Sunday-schools a most hearty commemoration. Christmas is peculiarly ours, for it marks the advent of a leader whose sole mission was to bring the kingdom of God on earth.

Religious Intelligence.

BOSTON UNITARIAN CLUB.—The regular monthly meeting of the club was held at the Vendome the evening of December 11, the president, Roger A. Wolcott, in the chair. The feature of the evening was an address by Rev. F. G. Peabody, D.D., on "Christianity and Socialism." He was followed by Rev. G. A. Gordon, D.D., of the Old South Church, and Mr. Edward Atkinson.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. William Everett, Ph.D., will preach Sunday morning, December 22. Service on Christmas Day at eleven o'clock, to which the public is cordially invited. This will take the place of the usual Wednesday noon-day meeting. There is service every Sunday afternoon at 3.30, at which all seats are free. These services are very interesting, and have an increasing attendance.

There will be no half-hour noon service at King's Chapel on Wednesday, December 25.

Ministers' Monday Club, December 23, 10.30 A.M. Rev. Philip S. Thacher will preside. Essay by Rabbi Raphael Laskar on "The Jewish Idea of Immortality."

Arlington Street Church: There will be a service in this church on the morning of Christmas Day. The service will commence at 11 A.M. The Christmas festival will be continued on the following Sunday.

New South Branch Women's Alliance on Friday evening, December 27, at 7.30, at church, corner of Tremont and Camden Streets. By request Mrs. Laura Tilden Greene will read her paper on "Lucy Larcom," assisted by singing, with piano accompaniment. All friends are cordially invited to attend.

Parker Memorial, corner of Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Sunday evening, December 22, special Christmas service conducted by Rev. James De Normandie of Roxbury. Subject, "New Wine in New Bottles." Appropriate music by a selected boys' choir in charge of Mr. Percy J. J. Cooper. All seats free, and a hearty welcome.

Dorchester: The Norfolk Unitarian Church is having a course of six Wednesday evening entertainments. Rev. M. J. Savage gave the first last Wednesday,—a lecture on "American Wit and Humor." The remaining five are as follows: Wednesday, January 1, Carolyn M. Field, "History of Spire Growth"; Wednesday, January 15, Damon Sisters' Orchestra; Wednesday, January 29, Gen. A. P. Martin, "The Battle of Gettysburg"; Wednesday, February 12, Mrs. Emily A. Fifield, "Present Condition of our Public Schools"; Wednesday, February 26, grand concert (talent to be announced). Tickets for the course, $1.

Benevolent Fraternity of Churches: The ministry at large representing this organization takes pains, on the approach of Christmas, to see in what directions it can wisely work. There is always a danger in these days of indiscriminate dispensing Christmas good cheer. The Benevolent Fraternity is able, through its ministers and workers, to reach many homes and cases which are not on the surface. It will this year, as heretofore, make the day a happy one to children and adults in all parts of the city where its work is carried on. Any individuals who wish to contribute to this end can send to any one of the well-known ministers representing the Fraternity, or to the president, Rev. Edward A. Horton, 25 Beacon Street.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. Howard N. Brown of King's Chapel, Boston, will preach in the First Parish Church on Sunday next, December 22. Communion service immediately after the sermon.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.—The Church of the Saviour is in possession of another beautiful memorial window given by the children of the late Mr. Isaac Frothingham. It was unveiled on Sunday morning, December 15, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot preaching a sermon appropriate to the occasion from the text, "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God!" These words appear on the window, which is the work of the Tiffany Glass and Decorating Company, who probably have never produced anything more lovely and artistic. The lower part is a landscape picture, representing a running brook in the midst of a forest, and a hart quenching his thirst at its waters. The setting sun sheds its glory over all. Two angels in flowing robes, carrying large, up-lifted trumpets, fill the upper part of the window.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—On the evening of December 10 the Young People's Society of the First Parish Church gave a reception to the Unitarian students of Harvard and Radcliffe in the church parlor. Several hundred young people were in attendance, and the occasion was an enjoyable one. A new Bible class is being organized for the young people, in connection with the Sunday-school, to be taught by Prof. Toy. The last meeting of the Women's Alliance was largely devoted to a review of the work of the late Helen G. Putnam, who had many warm friends in the parish.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—A correspondent writes: "The most interesting event which had taken place for several years in Unitarian circles in Cincinnati was the ordination and installation services of George R. Gebauer as pastor of Unity Church, on Sunday evening, December 8. Mr. Gebauer, during his three months' stay in Cincinnati, had already, through his own personality, endeared himself to the hearts of his congregation; while his helpful and scholarly sermons had attracted considerable notice in the outside world. There was little wonder, therefore, that College Hall, which is the place of worship of Unity Church, was tested to its utmost capacity on this occasion by the presence of almost all the people of Cincinnati best known for their encouragement of liberality in religion. Upon the stage, which was tastefully decorated with flowers and tropical plants, were seated Rev. T. B. Forbush, Rev. George A. Thayer, Rev. David Philipson, rabbi of the Holy Congregation Children of Israel, Rev. John Goddard of the Church of the New Jerusalem, Rev. Hugo Eisenlohr of St. John's Evangelical Protestant Church, Mr. Gebauer, and Mr. Stephen G. Jones, chairman of the board of trustees of Unity Church. Behind these was seated the choir, under the direction of Prof. Joseph P. Donnelly of the College of Music. The installation sermon and charge to the minister were delivered by Mr. Forbush. The right hand of fellowship was given by Mr. Thayer, and the address of welcome by Rev. H. G. Eisenlohr. In the absence of Rev. E. A. Coil, late pastor of the church, who was to have delivered the charge to the people, Mr. Thayer read Mr. Coil's manuscript. Mr. Jones gave the installation address. The services were interspersed with excellent music by the choir and congregational singing. At the conclusion all present felt uplifted and encouraged by the wise and helpful words which had been spoken, and the members of Unity Church especially felt that they could take up their work again with renewed vigor."

DENVER, COL.—Rev. George W. Cutter of Newport has declined the call extended to him by Unity Church.

IOWA CITY, IA.—Rev. Charles E. Perkins is giving a series of Sunday evening lectures in the Unitarian church, under the general name "World Helpers of Modern Times."

LEOMINSTER, MASS.—The Young People's Unitarian Union of Leominster was organized on Sunday evening, October 27, with the pastor, Rev. George M. Bodge, as president. The meetings are held on Sunday evenings; and the first series has been given to the general subject, "The Religion of the American Poets." Evenings have been given, thus far, to Whittier, Longfellow, Bryant, Emerson, Lowell, and Holmes. The attendance of the young people has been large, and constantly increasing from the first. There is a growing readiness on the part of the members to assist at the services by sketches, brief essays, select reading, singing, quotations, etc. A general invitation is extended without any age limit to membership. At the last meeting the attendance overcrowded the chapel parlors.

NEW YORK, N.Y.—Of recent events here there has been nothing of nearer and of more tender interest to Unitarians than the tribute paid by the Ethical Society a week ago Sunday to the memory of Mr. Frothingham. Carnegie Music Hall was filled by the usual congregation that gathers there to listen to Prof. Adler, plus the large number of friends and old parishioners of Mr. Frothingham in this city. Mr. Edmund C. Stedman, Mr. George Haven Putnam, Justice George C. Barrett, and Prof. Felix Adler spoke successively on the life, character, and influence of the illustrious preacher, whom Mr. Stedman called a New Englander of New England and an Athenian of ancient as well as modern Athens. Prof. Adler, who gave the concluding address, spoke of him as an inveterate doubter who never doubted; for, although, like a pilgrim, he was ever seeking the truth, he was always sure of his underlying strata. "He climbed many a crag and jutting stone, until he at last arrived at the dizzy height where shone upon him the light of God, and from where he could see the glories of the completed great city below him."

A correspondent writes of a sermon upon the thought and work of the late O. B. Frothingham by Rev. Merle St. Croix Wright on Sunday, December 15. He adds: "Having been a frequent listener to Mr. Frothingham, I could not but feel the truthfulness of Mr. Wright's estimate of him as a thinker. He spoke with becoming enthusiasm of his lofty plane of thought, of his fearlessness in the advocacy of the right, of his incisiveness of style, and especially of qualities which he was not generally credited to have had in any large degree; namely, those of tenderness and affection. . . . There is no blinking the fact that he was far in advance of his contemporaries in his opinions, and far more fearless in giving them expression. . . . The whole discourse was a glowing tribute of respect and veneration from a later, though not less ardent, seeker after truth, for one who in his day was in the very vanguard of liberal thought."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.—On Sunday, December 8, Ernest L. Staples, Esq., occupied the pulpit of the Unitarian church. He was formerly a member of the church in Derby over which Rev. Mr. Park was settled. He contracted a strong affection for Mr. Park, and had a very high estimation of his ability. It seemed very appropriate, therefore, to arrange to have Mr. Staples deliver a discourse in Pittsfield the Sunday following the funeral of Rev. Mr. Park. He seized the opportunity to speak of his friend, and to express the feelings in his own heart and in the hearts of the members of the congregation with respect to their great loss. At the funeral, which occurred the Wednesday before, the services were in charge of Rev. D. M. Wilson. Most of the clergymen of the town were present, seated on the platform; and Rev. Dr. Davis of the Trinitarian Congregational Church and Rev. Mr. Ballantine, another Congregational minister, took part in the exercises. It seemed as though the speakers could not say too much of the sincerity, devotion, and loyalty to truth manifested by Rev. Mr. Park throughout his life. The services were deeply affecting, and the entire experience has brought Mrs. Park and her family very close to the hearts of our Pittsfield congregation.

SANDWICH, MASS.—A platform meeting has been arranged for the 19th inst., in which the following gentlemen will take part: Rev. Messrs. J. A. Bevington of Barnstable, Albert Walkley of Brighton, James Huxtable of Boston, and Superintendent D. M. Wilson. It is anticipated that this meeting will increase the interest in our faith, not only in the parishioners of the old church, but in the people of the town generally.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Rev. A. J. Wells has just received a unanimous call to the pulpit of the Second Unitarian Church in San Francisco. Mr. Wells was a few years ago pastor of the First Congregational (orthodox) Church of Los Angeles. His present charge is but one block away from the church in San Francisco over which he was pastor ten years ago. Most amiable relations have always existed between these two societies, and under Mr. Wells the same pleasant relations will undoubtedly continue.

TACOMA, WASH.—The First Free Church, of which Rev. A. W. Martin is pastor, has passed the following resolutions relative to the death of Rev. O. B. Frothingham:—

"Whereas we have heard with deepest regret of the death of Octavius B. Frothingham of Boston, one of the foremost thinkers of his time, an honest, earnest, and fearless advocate of the cause of universal religion, a warm friend and honorary trustee of this society, a frequent contributor to the pages of its organ, the Free Church Record,—therefore,

"Be it resolved, by the members of the First Free Church of Tacoma, That it is the feeling of this organization that we have lost a true and tried friend, and the cause for which we stand a valued supporter and exponent, whose services, so valuable in the past, will continue to bear fruit in the years to come; and also

"Be it resolved, That this preamble and resolution be entered upon the records of the First Free Church of Tacoma, and copies thereof be sent by the secretary to the family of Mr. Frothingham, and for publication in the Free Church Record, the Christian Register, the Unitarian, Unity, the Southern Unitarian, and Pacific Unitarian."

WHITMAN, MASS.—Rev. H. D. Stevens has accepted a unanimous call extended to him by the church in Whitman. He has already begun his labors, in which he will obtain the hearty co-operation of the society.

NEW YORK LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—The second meeting of the year was held December 6 at the Second Unitarian Church of Brooklyn, with an attendance of about two hundred and twenty-five. Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper in the chair. A letter was read from Rev. Helen G. Putnam, gratefully acknowledging the receipt of some money sent to her by the league to use for rest. This letter, and the telegram bearing the sad news of her death, were received here about the same time. Mrs. Bishopric read the "Religious News Report," and that of the Philanthropic Committee was presented by Mrs. John W.

Chadwick. The subject for the day was "The Rights of Capital and Labor." Mrs. Benjamin B. Kenyon of New York read a paper in which she held that, rather than advocate the extreme views of capital and labor,—either that labor creates and therefore should give a title to the profit, or that capital is the real creator to which belongs the gain,—the intermediate ground is nearer the truth,—that both capital and labor assist in creating. The status of the laborer was reviewed from the days of practical slavery in England to the present time. In 1348 a day's wages were a penny, and any lord paying more was liable to a fine. About this time the workingmen began to combine, and what was practically the first trades-union was formed. The trades-union has resulted in the serious consideration and improvement of the condition of the laborer. Their wages have increased, and they have succeeded in securing the passage of laws for their protection. Since both capital and labor assist in creating, a system of profit-sharing enterprises was advocated by the writer. It has been proved that under this system the quantity and quality of work done are superior to that of any other method.

Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell presented the second paper. She said that capital and labor are essentially equal under our social conditions. The capitalist is helpless without the laborer, and vice versa. Each has something the other needs. The trades-union has introduced a new feature into the labor market. Formerly the laborer must take the wages offered or starve; but now labor, as well as capital, can subsist while they bargain, and there is more opportunity for reasonable discussion of their needs. When the bargain is at last struck, instead of being an end to the matter, it is but the beginning of the new relation,—that of employer and employee; and it is the rights of these two classes which cause so much disturbance. Mrs. Lowell preferred to change this word "rights" to "duties" in her further discussion. There are no rights without corresponding duties. As the laborer demands good pay and short hours, so should he give fair measure and honest time. The community, also, has a duty,—to be willing to pay a fair price. It must no more be willing to be the recipient of stolen hours and strength than of stolen goods. Mrs. Lowell strongly advocated arbitration and conciliation in the settlement of troubles between employers and employees. She cited several instances, such as the Bricklayers' Board of Conciliation of New York, to prove that this free discussion of the concerns of both is the wisest way of settling troubles and preventing strikes.

Miss Woodbridge, secretary of the Working-women's Society of New York, was then introduced, and gave some interesting figures, showing the average wages of women and children for skilled and unskilled labor, the number of hours employed, and time lost in enforced vacations. When one realizes that seventy-five per cent of our insane come from this class, the cruel fact of their unsanitary surroundings, their low wages, and hard work, forces one to the determination to urge the passage this year at Albany of the bill providing for factory inspectors to enforce the law here in New York. Miss Presky followed with an earnest talk of the condition of her fellow-workers in the factories. She bitterly felt the wrong done to working-classes by the low wages paid to women and children, crowding out the men, the bread-winners, and lowering the condition of every family. With the women supplanting the men at a lower figure, she felt the working-classes would never have a chance to rise.

General Religious Notes.

The Lutherans are to hold a national convention of Lutheran societies at Pittsburg, Pa.

According to Bishop Merrill there are more Methodist churches in Chicago than in any city in the world.

The number of British Societies of Christian Endeavor has reached three thousand,—an increase in the year of about eleven hundred.

A new series of "Forward Movement" lectures has been planned for London and other cities. They will begin in January, and go on through February. The general title is "Protestant Principles as understood by Unitarians." Nearly all the London congregations will take part in this fresh attempt to enlist public interest in progressive religious thought, and it is hoped that many in the country will adopt the same course.

The Dutch Protestant Union has recently celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. Dr. Groenewegen from Rotterdam delivered an address on "The Relation of Free Protestantism to the Learning of our Times," which seems to have been one of the most important and well-received utterances of the convention. Dr. Groenewegen is a young man, pupil of Dr. Kuenen, whose earnestness made a decided impression. "The future lies not in the hands of scholars," he said, "but with men full of religion and ethical energy. Our highest duties toward the world lie in this direction." There is a certain division at present in the union. The older members are apparently united in the desire to keep the objects of the association as they have been from the beginning,—namely, to advance religious thinking and doing; while there is a strong younger element who consider the study of social questions and effort toward their solution the most worthy aims of the union.

The pawn-shop connected with St. Bartholomew's Church in New York City has accommodated, since it was opened eighteen months ago, about thirty-three thousand people, with loans in amounts less than $100. The aggregate amount advanced on these loans was $550,000. About $200,000 has been paid back, with interest; and last week some four hundred unredeemed pledges—opera-glasses, clocks, revolvers, music-boxes, silverware, jewelry, etc.—were sold at auction. In every case where the article, on being sold, brought more than the loan and interest, the surplus was returned to the owner: if less, the society—the Provident Loan—stood the loss. It will be remembered that this enterprise was started by wealthy parishioners of Dr. Greer's church, to help the worthy poor. They subscribed a capital of $100,000, which was afterward increased to $200,000. The rate of interest on loans was fixed at one per cent. per month: regular pawnshops were charging thirty per cent. The enterprise has been conducted on strict business principles, and great help has been given, while at the same time the projectors have been paid interest on money invested.—Zion's Herald.

Business Notices.

Coughs and Hoarseness.—The irritation that induces coughing is immediately relieved by using "Brown's Bronchial Troches." A simple and safe remedy.

A Fine Gift.—Every music-lover will be deeply interested in the Music Cabinet which the Paine Furniture Company offer for their holiday trade. It is described in another column. It is, in reality, an exceptionally fine $15 cabinet, on which they set a price of $11.

Tours to the Orient.—Messrs. Raymond and Whitcomb are extending their tours abroad with very marked success. They have coming trips advertised to all parts of Europe, and also to the Orient, where one party is now travelling. After two months spent most delightfully in touring through Japan, this party is now in Southern China, and, in fact, about sailing from Hong Kong homeward. A second tour is announced for the spring, with February 24 as the date of leaving Boston. Only a limited number of passengers will be taken. It should be noted that the visit to Japan is to occur during the cherry-blossom season, which is everywhere the occasion of festivities. In connection with this tour a visit can be made to the Hawaiian Islands. An illustrated book descriptive of the tour may be obtained free by addressing Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, Boston.

Holiday Tours to Washington and Atlanta.—A special holiday tour via Royal Blue Line leaves Boston for Washington, D.C., Thursday, December 26. Trip occupies seven days, and rate covering hotel accommodations and every expense is but $23. On same date a party leaves Boston for the Atlanta Exposition, stopping at Philadelphia, Luray, Natural Bridge, Chattanooga, etc. Time occupied, ten days; rate $58. Both parties personally conducted. For itineraries, address A. J. Simmons, N. E. P. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Leominster, 27th ult., by Rev. George M. Bodge, Orson E. Emerick and Harriet A. DeWolfe, both of Leominster.
In Leominster, 11th inst., by Rev. George M. Bodge, Walter E. Davis, of Fitchburg, and Nellie Pierce, of Leominster.
In Barre, 10th inst., by Rev. A. F. Bailey, Herbert L. Carruth, of Hardwick, and Jennie M. Stone, of Barre.

CHANDLER & CO.

Christmas Opening
Duchesse Gloves.

Nothing but the best quality will do for a Christmas Gift, and a box of nice gloves is always sure to please. Those who buy the DUCHESS GLOVE have the Best Glove made.

CHANDLER & CO.

Winter Street, Boston.

For the Christian Register.

CHRISTMAS-TIDE.

BY IDA M. COOKE.

A time when Joy holds Carnival. When Love,
All unrestrained, speaks deep what Love must feel.
When Hate burns not so fiercely, as above
The clamor and the discord rife the peal,
"Peace on the earth," rings sweetly. When the heart
Of Charity beats warmest, and the hand
Reaches out farthest. When the tears that start
Are tears of gratefulness, not tears that stand
For Woe. Then gather in the holly fair,
The world-famed laurel bring. And far and wide
Let the glad chimes' resounding fill the air
To usher in the joyous Christmas-tide.

Literature.

A STUDY OF DEATH. By Henry Mills Alden, author of "God in his World." New York: Harper & Brothers.—Mr. Alden has given us another remarkable book, as mystical as "God in his World," and quite as impressive as that. "There is no life that is not unto death," said Bunsen, "no death that is not unto higher life." This is the ground idea of Mr. Alden's book. Many things combine to make it interesting. While it is as mystical as Tauler, it takes up into itself a great deal of modern science, assimilating what it wants to further its own ends and letting go the rest. The book is written in a style that is quite magical, and there are scores of sentences and passages that have a value quite independent of the general purpose. There are allegorical interpretations of surprising force and beauty,—that, for example, of "The Divided Living," a cosmic parable of the specialization of the Infinite Life in myriad forms. In the book called "Native Impressions" we cannot help believing that Mr. Alden has imported much of his own thought and feeling into his imaginative reconstruction of the early world as dealing with the mystery of death. The concluding part is the least satisfactory. The stress upon the personality of Jesus and his resurrection is out of place in a conception of the world so little orthodox or conventional,—a conception that demands Mr. Emerson's doctrine, "The soul knows no persons," in his sense,—none that are unique, none that are not illustrations of universal spiritual laws. There is not the least attempt to keep on good terms with the traditionalists. Their opinions are traversed with naive indifference to their solemn claims. But what is intellectually surrendered seems to have an emotional persistence in the writer's brain. Like all mystical writers, he finds what he wants most abundant in the Fourth Gospel, where we are furthest off from the hard earth of historical reality. But we are crushing a butterfly upon the wheel,—no, not a butterfly, but a skylark. We are treating Mr. Alden as if he were a prosaist, and he is a poet. His book contains a thousand beauties, which suffer no detriment from anything in his illogical procedure. In this noisy time it is a book that will make "A bower of quiet for us,

Full of sweet dreams and health and quiet breathing."

MUSICIANS AND MUSIC LOVERS, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By William Foster Apthorp. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—We know of no musician in America who has a finer equipment as a musical critic than Mr. Apthorp, and we know of no one who uses it to better advantage. Mr. Apthorp has gone through the whole range of musical literature, studying scores, biographies, and the scientific and theoretical aspects of musical history and expression. He has drunk in enough knowledge to produce intellectual drowsy, if he had not such complete powers of assimilation. As musical critic of the Atlantic Monthly, and for many years of the Boston Transcript, and as editor of the programmes of the Boston Symphony concerts, he has attained a wide reputation. Perhaps no American writer has had a finer command of English in musical criticism than the late John S. Dwight. But Mr. Apthorp is quite the equal of Mr. Dwight in this respect,—which is saying a good deal,—and is wider in his musical sympathies, besides having had the advantage of a more thorough musical education. In this volume Mr. Apthorp has brought together a number of his essays, some of them given as Lowell lectures in Boston, others printed in the Contemporary Review, the Atlantic, the International Review. In these essays music is treated in various aspects of biographical, emotional, artistic, literary, and scientific interest. There is a noble essay on John Sebastian Bach; and we can imagine Mr. Dwight singing a loud "Amen!" in the heavenly choirs when Mr. Apthorp says "that there is no more trustworthy gauge of a man's musical nature and culture than his appreciation and love for Bach." There are critical studies of Meyerbeer, Offenbach, a learned essay on "Additional Accompaniments to Bach's and Handel's Scores," and especially interesting are "Some Thoughts on Musical Criticism" and on "Music and Science." The book is an alluring one to music-lovers; and no musician, of course, will want to be without it.

WESTMINSTER. By Sir Walter Besant, M.A., F.S.A. With 130 Illustrations by William Patten and others. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. $3.—The papers in this volume first appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette. They have been revised and enlarged. Mr. Besant does not offer us a history of Westminster. It has been his endeavor, rather, to show, contrary to received opinion, that the Isle of Bramble was a busy place of trade long before London existed at all; second, to restore the vanished palaces of Westminster and Whitehall; third, to portray the life of the abbey, with its services, its rule, its anchorites, and its sanctuary; fourth, to show the connection of Westminster with the first of English printers; and, lastly, to present the place as a town and borough, with its streets and people. Of the ten chapters of the book, three, however, are devoted to the abbey. Nearly every one who has treated of the beginnings of Westminster Abbey has assumed that the place on which it stands was chosen as a fitting place for a monastic foundation because of its seclusion, silence, and remoteness. Mr. Besant, in his opening chapter, examines this assumption, and endeavors to upset this cherished opinion. He approaches the whole subject in a scientific spirit, and without ecclesiastical prepossessions. Excavations show the remains of Roman villas, so that it is now impossible to doubt the existence there of a Roman station. "Before London existed, Thorney had become a place of the greatest importance." Mr. Besant treats this old subject in all its aspects with characteristic freshness. The volume is profusely illustrated; and, in spite of all that has been written about Westminster, this book will make a place of its own as a fit companion to the author's "London."

MARGARET AND HER FRIENDS; OR, TEN CONVERSATIONS WITH MARGARET FULLER UPON THE MYTHOLOGY OF THE GREEKS AND ITS EXPRESSION IN ART. Reported by Caroline W. Healy. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—The conversations reported were held at the house of Rev. George Ripley in 1841. It would probably have been better for their vague, elusive fame if Mrs. Dall had not reported them. Emerson, in his "Memoirs" of Margaret, says there were five of these conversations, and that he was present at the second only. There were ten of them, and he was present at three. So, evidently, they "profited him nothing"; and he does not appear to have done much to improve their quality. Miss Fuller was frequently dissatisfied because the conversation wandered from her text. But, as reported here, her text was that soft cheese of the Spanish proverb which you can with difficulty take upon a hook. The book is mainly interesting as an illustration of the way they did things in the days before science. Neither Miss Fuller nor her friends seem to have been well furnished for their work. Doubtless, our means of knowing something of the Greek mythology have much improved since 1841; but, even for that time, the talkers do not appear to have been well informed. Sometimes there is a penetrating remark, such as Emerson's "We are not finite." Miss Healy's (Mrs. Dall) own contribution shines in comparison with that furnished by the others generally, so that it is impossible to avoid the wonder if she did not succeed better in reporting herself than her friends.

JOSEPH, THE DREAMER. By Robert Bird, author of "Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth." New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—Encouraged by the unexpected success of his "Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth," Mr. Bird has attempted "to set forth in a living way the story of one who, next to the Holy One of Galilee, is to children the most attractive figure in the Bible." The paraphrase is extremely free, as may be imagined from the fact that we have here nearly four hundred pages printed very solidly. For ourselves, we much prefer the original form, and should much prefer that our children would read that one hundred times over instead of reading this once, as they might do in the same time. But there is no accounting for tastes, and the success of the former venture makes it every way probable that this one will be well received. Gen. Lew Wallace may object to such evident poaching on his preserve, but he and Mr. Bird must settle that between them. Mr. Bird could do David, perhaps, better than the general; and the general could certainly do Solomon better than Mr. Bird. "Divide et impera."

SUNSHINE AND HAAR: SOME FURTHER GLIMPSES OF LIFE AT BARN CRAIG. By Gabriel Setoun. New York: Harper & Brothers, publishers.—In a preface to this volume Mr. Setoun (if it be not Mrs.) informs us that, although some part of it was written before "Barn Craig" (a book which has been well received), it is intended to be something of a sequel and something of a supplement to that series of sketches. Those were intended to give an impression of the every-day, uneventful life of Barn Craig, while the present series is intended more to give an impression of the collective life of the village in its days of special rejoicing,—"sunshine" and "haar," its fog and gloom. The book is divided into two parts. The first part has quite independent value, and its chapters are very entertaining. The second part harks back to one of the stories in "Barn Craig"; and to its full enjoyment a previous knowledge of that story, "What Santa Claus brought to the Poet," is quite indispensable. One of the pleasantest customs delineated in the first part is that of "First Footing,"—i.e., the first calling on New Year's Day; and the story illustrating this custom, "Rob Allen's First Fort," is the best jewel in the carcanet. But some others are not far behind.

THE CITY OF THE SULTANS: CONSTANTINOPLE. By Clara Erskine Clement. Boston: Estes & Lauriat. Illustrated.—At no time could this book be received with wider interest than at present. When every one is speaking and thinking of Armenia, it is well to know the history of Constantinople. In beautiful form, as a companion volume to Mrs. Clement's stories of Naples and Venice, we have the fascinating story of one of the most remarkable cities in the world. In addition to the history of the past, there is an excellent account of the customs of the present. While wondering if the days of the Turk in Europe are not numbered, Mrs. Clement thus concludes: "However this may be, and whoever may succeed him, it is true that, if any spot exists on earth where peace and good will to men should reign, where the influences of nature should develop all that is lovely and elevating to mankind,—poetry, art, and all the gentler virtues and graces of human life,—it is in and around this city of Constantine, which for nearly four centuries and a half has been the home of the Sultans."

THE WONDERFUL VISIT. By H. G. Wells. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.25.—The writer of this book has set himself to consider what would happen if a beautiful, unspotted angel should suddenly appear upon earth, introduced to the conventionality and pretence and petty ambitions of our ordinary life. This is not the angel of the Hebrews, "of whom only Watts has caught the shadow, of whom only Blake has seen the splendor," nor the angel of popular belief, with domestic and sympathetic callings, but the angel of Italian art, gay and polychromatic, dweller in the land of beautiful dreams, untouched by sin or sorrow or suffering. In this conception there is ample room for bright imagination, keen sarcasm, and effective humor; and the writer has succeeded in indicating as much, for the thought grows on one up to the time when the angel "saw this grim little world of battle and cruelty transfigured in a splendor that outshone the angelic land, suffused suddenly and insupportably glorious with the wonderful light of love and sacrifice."

AFTERMATH. Part II. of "A Kentucky Cardinal." By James Lane Allen. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This is certainly a queer book. It is the book of a man who does not take himself quite seriously enough,—an unusual thing, suggestive of some cerebral lesion. He does not seem to stand in sufficient reverence of his own good genius. With things delicately beautiful, he gives us things which are the mere horse-play of the humorist. Take Sylvia's poems, for example. They affect like pieces of raw turnip suddenly encountered in one's biscuit glacé. The touch on natural things, as in Mr. Lane's previous ventures, is entirely satisfactory. A capital bit is his rabbit-hunting with the West Point student who had looked down upon him. Kentucky duelling and "self-defence" come in for a powerful thrust. But the general impression is that Mr. Lane was in haste to make another book, and so dragged together various things that have no necessary or appropriate connection with each other.

CHILDREN'S STORIES IN AMERICAN LITERATURE, 1660-1860. By Henrietta Christian Wright. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—This can hardly be considered a successful book. Evidently, it has been hastily compiled, and without much regard to the children for whom it is nominally intended. The best opportunities to make the stories interesting for them are neglected in the strangest manner. For example, Parkman's heroic battle with adverse conditions receives only the most casual mention. Everywhere as little as possible is made of the personality and the incidents of the life, and the treatment resolves itself into a catalogue of the author's books characterized in the driest manner. Poe might have been a model of all the virtues, Cooper the mildest-mannered man that ever lived, for anything to the contrary here. Bryant's "Green River" was not "a retrospective poem"; and the statement that it was is one of many that in one way or another miss the mark.

L'AVRIL. A novel translated from the French of Paul Marguerite. By Helen B. Dole. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—The outward daintiness of this book is exactly suited to the character of its contents. The author is an artist by vocation, and it is with him as it is with many: the work of his avocation has a particular felicity. There is nothing improbable in the story,—that of a lovely girl falling sick from the shock of disappointed love, seeking new scenes, making new friends, and piecing together the fragments of her broken heart so that it is quite as good as new. So simple a plot tells nothing. The story having it might be extremely commonplace. But "L'Avril" is not. The young girl and her surroundings and her friends are all indicated with much delicacy and charm. And a story book which does not end with a murder or a funeral in these days is something which, when seen, we should make a note of.

AMOS JUDD. By J. A. Mitchell, editor of Life. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—The author of this story has been enticed by Crawford's "Mr. Isaacs" and Du Maurier's "Peter Ibbetson," and has resolved that he can carry the same kind of thing a good deal further. He has made the attempt, and his efforts have been crowned with more than tolerable success. The book is made up of improbabilities and impossibilities in about equal parts; but they are woven together with so much consistency that we allow ourselves to be fooled to the top of our bent, like Locker's "Nurse, called Anne," "without the least objection." The prosperity of such a book lies very much in the taste of him who reads it. If one likes such things, it will be vastly entertaining. If one does not, he may not continue to the end unless the extreme felicity with which the whole thing is done beguiles him on and on.

FABLES AND ESSAYS. By John Bryan of Ohio. Vol. I. Complete in itself. New York: The Art and Letters Company. Mr. Bryan's book is handsomely made, and has the cheerful external appearance that suits well its spiritual contents. He has had the manuscripts of these things by him for years, and been trying to suppress, even "sitting on the safety-valve"; but out they had to come. He hopes the public will buy the book, for then they will know something of him, if he knows nothing of them; and that will be "friendship half-seas over." Many of the fables are very bright, and some of them are more forcible than elegant in their expression. At page 119 there is a new preface, the first having proved the wrong one to the wrong book. He begs not to be judged by a few of his pieces, as if they were all. But he has little to fear on this score. Those who dip into him will want to drain his well.

NATURAL HISTORY OF SELBORNE. By Gilbert White. Introduction by John Burroughs. Illustrations by Clifton Johnson. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—As Mr. Burroughs says of the book, in his introduction, "It has a perennial charm: . . . it is simple and wholesome, like bread, or meat, or milk." We feel its "rural England atmosphere," the genial personality of the country parson who a hundred years ago spent such happy hours in studying the fauna and flora and even the weather about him. His letters have nothing of scientific dryness; and one cannot fail to be interested in the barn-owls who hooted in B-flat, the old tortoise who took his winter nap under the hepaticas, and all the other Selborne neighbors. To those who have never known Gilbert White before it is enough to be introduced by John Burroughs.

OLD BOSTON. Reproductions of Etchings in Half-tone. Etchings and Text by Henry R. Blaney. Boston: Lee & Shepard. $2.50.—Boston has not a great deal of antiquity compared with many cities of the Old World. But it is proud of what it has, at least some of its people are. The march of improvement, however, has destroyed not a few of the old landmarks. These and other buildings which still stand are pictorially brought together in this volume by Mr. Blaney. In all there are thirty-five illustrations, some of them reproduced from rare old etchings, and others etched by Mr. Blaney from photographs. The reproductions bring out well the characteristic feature of the etchings, so that this excellent collection, attractively bound, and with an explanatory text, is brought within the reach of many readers.

THE HORSE FAIR. By James Baldwin. New York: The Century Company. $1.50. Mr. Baldwin has already made children love legends and mythology with "The Story of Siegfried" and "A Story of the Golden Age." The present book is of like character, but different arrangement. The plan of having all the celebrated horses of history and mythology meet at one great horse fair in the land of Morgan, the Fay, is original, but somewhat confusing. A little American boy—a Philip, of course—is taken by Cheiron to see the wondrous show, and is told the story of each famous horse. From all lands and ages come representatives; and in the same lists we see the steeds of Day and Night and the chargers of our own American generals. It will be a good thing for boys to read this book and pick up little knowledge of the classics while sharing Mr. Baldwin's fondness for horses.

CRUISING AMONG THE CARIBBEES. By Charles Augustus Stoddard. Illustrated. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.—Dr. Stoddard is the editor of the New York Observer; and he has written several books of travel, one or two of which, notably the one about Russia, has received considerable adverse criticism on the ground of inaccuracy of statement. The present volume, however, is mainly a recital of personal experiences. It tells us of summer days in winter months, as he cruised leisurely among the Windward Islands. The descriptions of the places visited and the sketches of the people with whom he came in contact seem to be carefully considered and impartial. These chapters offer considerable information about a part of the world concerning which there are comparatively few books of value.

CHILHOWEE BOYS IN WAR TIME. By Sarah E. Morrison. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—The first book about Chilhowee boys, published about two years ago, told how Parson Craig, with his household and neighbors, making in all a caravan of about twenty people, emigrated from North Carolina to Chilhowee Valley in Tennessee. The close of the book left them happy, prosperous, and useful in their new home; and the present volume takes them through a new set of experiences. The War of 1812 interfered with all plans for study, since the boys had to take the places of their elders on the farm until the treaty of Ghent put an end to the trouble. These books are not at all sensational; but they are bright and interesting, giving a good idea of a kind of life that required patience, industry, and often bravery.

KATAWAMPUS: ITS TREATMENT AND CURE. By his Honor Judge Edward Abbott Parry. Illustrated by Archie Macgregor. London: D. Nutt & Co. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.25.—This is a story which the little ones will find delightfully funny and interesting, because it will probably appeal to their own experience. It sets out to diagnose truthfully the trouble that ensues when little boys and girls insist on having their own way, and it tells how the four children of the story were finally provided with new tempers and good manners that worked to perfection. Katawampus is the name of this trouble, and it has already become a household word among certain children; and its symptoms are recognized with uncomplimentary frankness. Some of the jokes will be better appreciated by the older readers.

VEXILLA REGIS. Quotodie. L. B. S. Boston: Berkeley Updike.—The book takes its title from the first words of the ancient passion-tide hymn written by Venantius Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers. The hymn, written in 609, is stamped with the errors of that age, and the false Christology that marked it. However, that has little to do with this book, which is simply a selection of passages or verses for every day in the year. The selections are made in a catholic spirit. We have even such a cosmic philosopher as John Fiske furnishing daily food with Pascal, Bishop Brooks, Longfellow, Lowell, and various churchmen and heretics. The selections are classified with reference to various subjects, and even the animals have a place. This is the second edition, the first having been privately printed.

SONG-BLOSSOMS. By Julia Anna Wolcott. Boston: Arena Publishing Company. Miss Wolcott's "Song-blossoms" are fragrant, and certainly not without color. They bloom with delicate tints rather than with gorgeous hues. Some of them are poems of nature, to whose whisperings Miss Wolcott has a susceptible ear. We have odors here of river-side and meadow and the breezes from the hills and the charm of the wayside flowers. There are pleasant hours with the children, poems in lovely mood; and there are others with incense of the sanctuary. Many of these poems have appeared in current periodicals. Miss Wolcott has an easy command of versification, and her verses are rhythmic and melodious.

DEAR LITTLE MARCHIONESS: THE STORY OF A CHILD'S FAITH AND LOVE. With an introduction by Bishop Gailor. Illustrated by W. L. Taylor. New York, 46 East

Fourteenth Street, and Boston, 100 Purchase Street: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—The name of the author of this simple story is not given; but we are told in the preface that it was written by one who ministered in person to the sick and dying during the epidemic of yellow fever in the city of Memphis in 1878. The sketch of the little girl with her faith and love is full of pathos and beauty, and is enhanced by "Uncle Wise," with his Negro fidelity, quaint speech, and pathetic narrative. The illustrations and general make-up are also attractive.

THE BOYS OF 1745. By James Otis. Boston: Estes & Lauriat.—It is a new departure for James Otis to send out a book with a certain historical setting; but it is no wonder if he is beginning to seek a change from his numerous newsboys and homeless waifs. This tells of two boys who set out together from Portsmouth, N.H., to share in that attempt to help the mother country which ended in the capture of Louisburg. The one went with the simple intention of doing his duty, disagreeable or not. The other was bent on the personal advantages he hoped to gain, and their different experiences will doubtless be found interesting by young readers.

THE THREE APPRENTICES OF MOON STREET. From the French of Georges Montorgueil. With illustrations. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. $1.50.—John, Johnny, and Jack are the three lads whose adventures form the subject of this story; and their characters may be inferred from their names. John is the proper model of virtuous apprentices, Johnny is sometimes good and sometimes bad; but Jack is the mischievous little imp, always in trouble on account of his misdeeds. Nevertheless, he is the most interesting of the three, and is evidently the reason of existence for this beautifully written story intended to edify as well as amuse French children.

JOEL, A BOY OF GALILEE. By Annie Fellows Johnston. Roberts Brothers. $1.50.—It is no new thought to present the life of Jesus in the form of a story about one who lived in his times and was touched by his influence. Provided the reader is willing to accept the literal interpretations of the wonder stories of the New Testament, this book ranks above most attempts of this kind. The story is told with simplicity and even a certain dignity that are in accord with the subject; and we see the figure of Jesus more through his influence than by personal contact. Still, the story itself is too great to be subjected to retellings that add nothing to its power.

HALF A DOZEN BOYS. By Anna Chapin Ray. New York and Boston: T. Y. Crowell. $1.50.—This book was first published about five years ago; and in the mean time the real boys, from whose experiences together the story was drawn, have grown up, and the new preface tells us that the next Yale catalogue will show the names of four of them. The book is evidently the outgrowth of a genuine liking and respect for boy nature. Its influence is wholesome; and the social times which the half-dozen have together were such as would only strengthen them for the experiences of later life, though they liked fun as well as the boys we all know.

IN THE OKEFENOKEE. By Louis Pendleton. Roberts Brothers. $1.25.—This is a story of the last days of the Confederacy, and introduces the reader to a group of rough men who have deserted from the Southern army, and are in hiding in the great Georgia swamp. Afraid that their hiding-place may be revealed, they keep as prisoners two boys who have lost themselves in this wild waste, known as a stronghold of the Seminoles in the Florida-Indian war. The attempts of the two boys to get away—attempts that were seconded by an old Negro who had been kidnapped by the deserters—form the main incidents of the story.

A CHILD OF TUSCANY. By Marguerette Bouvet. Illustrated by Phillips Hooper. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.—The author of this interesting story has woven into it many incidents and scenes which illustrate the ways and people of Florence. The contrasts of life are vividly presented, and the characters distinctly outlined. Foremost on the canvas is Camillo, to whom every reader's heart will warm for his genial kindness and deep human sympathy. This book will have a general attraction to the public, but especially to those who have visited "Florence, the fairest and most famous of the daughters of Rome."

THE MARVELS OF OUR BODILY DWELLING: PHYSIOLOGY MADE INTERESTING. By Mary Wood-Allen, M.D. Ann Arbor, Mich.: The Wood-Allen Publishing Company.—Some years ago "The Man Wonderful and the House Beautiful" delighted teachers of physiology and fascinated their pupils. Dr. Allen, who was joint author of that earlier book, has succeeded in making the present one still more interesting. While suitable for a school text-book, it is also in very readable form, and should be put in every child's library. Part II. contains excellent advice on the use of tobacco and alcohol, as well as the other "guests man entertains in his bodily dwelling."

SOME UNCONVENTIONAL PEOPLE. By Mrs. J. Gladwyn Jebb, author of "A Strange Career." Boston: Roberts Brothers.—This book completely justifies its title. The people it describes are nothing, if not unconventional. But their unconventionality does not make them particularly interesting. Some of them are too "low down" to be good company, and the undoubted firmness and piquancy with which they are realized make them all the more repellent. On the other hand, there are touches of great tenderness and beauty; and "The Detail of a Journey" is tenderness, and nothing but tenderness, in warp and woof.

THE BOY OFFICERS OF 1812. By Everett T. Tomlinson. Boston: Lee & Shepard. $1.50.—The material which Mr. Tomlinson uses in this series of stories is probably less familiar to most young readers than some other periods of our national existence, and it is certainly rich in suggestion for one who desires to weave together an exciting story of adventure. The historical allusions are true, and many of the incidents have a true historical basis. The expedition against Toronto, the attack on Sackett's Harbor, the defence of Fort Meigs, and Perry's victory are the most important events here described.

THE ART OF LIVING. By Robert Grant. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Illustrated. $2.50.—One of the foremost of modern fashion-philosophers is Robert Grant. To those for whom he writes his causerie is pleasing. To those for whom he does not write—the Rogers type, whom the author mentions as "the salt of the earth, a highly respectable man and deacon of a church"—the style seems unsympathetic. But any one who can live on $2,200 a year and bring up a family is not expected to express an opinion on this book, as it is not intended for him.

TURNING POINTS IN SUCCESSFUL CAREERS. By William M. Thayer. New York: T. Y. Crowell & Co.—It is not always possible to find the pivot on which a career has turned. Characters do not always turn: they grow, and the growth may be very gradual. Yet in the lives of many men there are epochs and opportunities which, being improved, make all the difference between success and failure. Mr. Thayer has great facility in biographical writing of the popular order, and this book bids fair to be as popular as its predecessors.

CRICKET. By Elizabeth Westyn Timlow. Illustrated by Harriet R. Richards. Boston: Estes & Lauriat.—This is a very simple and pretty story of a little girl who had many ludicrous adventures, was always getting into trouble and out again, and, in trouble or out, was "a winsome, wee thing," who should be floated into many a household on the coming Christmas tide. She will be well received, and do no one any harm, which is more than can be said of many books that are written for children in these times. The illustrations are better than common.

THE KNIGHT OF LIBERTY: A TALE OF THE FORTUNES OF LAFAYETTE. By Hezekiah Butterworth. Illustrated by H. Winthrop Peirce. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—This volume is no commonplace story, but is lighted up with brilliant cases of moral heroism, and abounds in striking incidents. The life of Lafayette is full of thrilling contrasts; and the narrative of Francis K. Huger, said to be substantially true, equals in noble generosity and fidelity the tales of knightly chivalry.

FROM THE BLACK SEA THROUGH PERSIA AND INDIA. By Edwin Lord Weeks. Illustrated by the author. New York: Harper & Brothers.—In this book we find combined a series of charming sketches and studies, notes on Oriental art and customs, a journal of travel, and a tale of adventure. The perils which Mr. Weeks and Mr. Child encountered together are exciting enough, and their varied experiences are of special interest. The great attraction, however, lies in the pictures.

NOTES IN JAPAN. By Alfred Parsons. Illustrations by the author. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Lovers of Mr. Parsons's pictures will find in his writing the same charm that lies in his drawing. The graceful touch and the delicate atmosphere are refreshing. There is an undeniable fascination about Japan; and one seldom hears too much about the splendors of the cherry viewing and the chrysanthemum glory, all of which Mr. Parsons saw and describes with the artist's touch.

WINDOW AND PARLOR GARDENING. By N. Jonsson Rose. With illustrations by the author. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—Besides a suggestive introduction, the book is divided into two parts,—one devoted to the propagation and care of house plants, and the other on the selection of house plants. A great deal of useful information is given. The text is enriched by a large number of illustrations. We cordially commend this book to all who desire to add beauty and joy to the home.

SCHOOL-BOY DAYS IN JAPAN. By André Laurie. Translated by Laura E. Kendall. Illustrated. Boston: Estes & Lauriat. The books by André Laurie have been very

A One-Dollar Superb Christmas Present

Bringing the giver to mind twelve times during a year. Every girl and woman will appreciate a year's subscription to

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

Send One Dollar to

The Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia

COPYRIGHT, 1896, BY THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

popular in France. The series of "College Life in All Countries" have been translated into German, French, English, and Spanish. This is the latest volume of the number. It is graphic and conversational in style; and a good many facts are woven into the story, embellished by the author's imagination.

SESAME AND LILIES. By John Ruskin. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—This dainty volume—one of the "Elia Series"—contains a preface to the first edition and a long preface written later. The main portion comprises three lectures,—“Of King's Treasures,” “Of Queen's Gardens,” “The Ministry of Life and its Arts.” These stimulating and inspiring lectures are full of the characteristics of Ruskin's genius.

MELODY. By Laura E. Richards. Boston: Estes & Lauriat.—The holiday edition of Mrs. Richards's pretty story is illustrated by Mr. Frank T. Merrill. The little blind girl, Melody, of the heavenly voice, is one of the most charming of Mrs. Richards's dream-children.

NEAL, THE MILLER. A SON OF LIBERTY. By James Otis. Illustrated. Boston: Estes & Lauriat.—This is one of the series of "Stories of American History," and gives us a lifelike picture of the early period before the actual hostilities began.

Recent Poetry.

I. E. A. Smith's "Souvenir Verse and Story" (Springfield: Clark W. Bryan Company) is a book of doggerel verse which has much in it of a very real love of nature, and the scenes by which it has been inspired. The narrow circle of Berkshire County friends for whom it is published will, no doubt, appreciate its modest worth.

"Poems of the Farm," selected and illustrated by Alfred C. Eastman (Boston: Lee & Shepard), is more successful in its illustrations than in its selections, some of which are excellent, while some are quite inferior, and the dominant tone is sadder than one could wish. It is a pity that the exigencies of space have abridged Whittier's "Forsaken Farm-house." We are glad that no such fate has overtaken Col. Higginson's "American Stonehenge."

Mary Yale Shapleigh's original verse and illustration, "On Wings of Fancy Blown" (Boston: Lee & Shepard), are certainly very pleasant to the eye and ear. The verses are musical, and the artist's habit of looking through her eyes instead of into her own heart has helped them to many a lively touch. The illustrations are much better when they deal with flowers than when they deal with landscapes or cherubic heads. Indeed, the flowers are done with quite remarkable felicity.

G. P. Putnam's Sons republish Bayard Taylor's "Echo Club," with a pleasant introduction by Richard Henry Stoddard. It is made up of very skilful parodies on a score or two of poets and conversational comments on their peculiarities. The book is a capital illustration of Taylor's immense facility; and the parodying is not of that kind which is amenable to George Eliot's charge of "debasement of the moral currency," as there is no attempt to make great things ridiculous. The ambitious leather binding does not impress us as a complete success.

"Whiffs from Wild Meadows," by Sam Walter Foss (Boston: Lee & Shepard), impresses us with the author's facile productivity. His muse must have been running like a mill-race since he published "Back Country Poems" a year or two ago. But it has run to good purpose. The present volume is a great improvement on its predecessor. There is some excellent fooling in it, and much poetry that is very tender and pathetic. It may be doubted whether Mr. Foss should have broken our hearts with his first poem, "Behind the Hill." He has grown more judiciously selective of funny things than he was in his first book. Inevitably, he challenges comparison with Will Carleton. He is raising flowers from his seed. But they are better flowers than Mr. Carleton has been getting in his own garden of late years. The merits of this book, as compared with Mr. Carleton's latest, are as ten to one. It might have been still better if more care had been spent on the mechanism of the verse.

Mr. William Wells Newell's "Words for Music" (Cambridge: Charles W. Sever, publisher) will be no surprise to those who have known the thoughtful and poetic temper of the man. It is a book of very genuine poetry written by a true lover of nature, and one who is, if not enamoured, fascinated by life's various mystery. The poems run to riddles, and some of them are hard to understand. Some of them only attempt to state the riddle, leaving us to guess it if we can. It is a book of "airs and distant echoes that convey A melancholy into all our day."

It is such a book as would more naturally have appeared fifty years ago than now. It has the Transcendental quality. Some of the measures have a sing-songish character which may find its justification in the title, "Words for Music." The writer may have had singing rather than reading in his mind in writing them. But any one who finds himself "weary of the surfaces" of recent poetry and likely to "die of inanition" may well come here for temporary restoration.

Miscellaneous.

One of the daintiest of Christmas books is a translation of "Tartarin of Tarascon," with illustrations (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.). Those who do not know this amusing creation of Daudet in French ought to make its acquaintance in English. The book is well printed with wide margins, and is daintily bound and illustrated.

What better fitted to heighten the spirit of Christmas cheer than Holmes's "Complete Poetical Works," which Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have just issued in the "Cambridge Edition"? It contains, also, a biographical sketch by Mr. Horace E. Scudder. The volume forms the fourth in the series, which includes the poems of Longfellow, Whittier, and Browning.

J. Stilman Smith & Co. are the publishers of a set of six small books, each of which contains a single short story by Edward Everett Hale. They are artistically bound in white and color, and are among the best of Dr. Hale's short stories. Nothing can be more acceptable for a Christmas gift than a set of such entertaining tales. Single copies are sold for 40 cents, or the set for $2.

Among the Christmas books which are not experimental, but which have already won a recognized place, is "The Madonna of the Tubs," by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have just issued an edition, with forty-three original illustrations by Ross Turner and George H. Clements. While the new books make their appeal, there are many who will turn with confidence to this established favorite.

Not only from its abundant illustrations, three hundred and seventy of which embellish this volume, but from its pleasing stories and poems, the Little Ones Annual for 1895 will be as popular as ever. It is edited by William T. Adams (Oliver Optic), and the illustrations are engraved under the superintendence of Mr. George P. Andrew. It is attractively bound; and, if the little reader's eyes do not twinkle when they see it, we are mistaken. (Boston: Estes & Lauriat. $1.75.)

Among the every-day books with nourishment for mind and heart which are now so common is "Daily Messages from the King by his Messengers to his Children." Selected and arranged by S. R. Z., with a preface by Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster (London: Marcus Ward & Co.). As the title suggests, this has been especially prepared for the use of the order of King's Sons and Daughters. But its value is by no means confined to these princes. The selections are mainly practical rather than simply reflective; and there are several thoughts for each day, with verses interspersed.

The remarkable address by Prof. Josiah Royce of Harvard University, on "The Conception of God," delivered before the

For the PIANO

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S CLASSICS."

Although especially designed to meet the needs of young pupils for brightness, interest, and genuine musical excellence, this collection is recommended to players of all ages who can master only easy music, and yet desire something above the common popular airs. The volume has been received with great favor by both teachers and pupils. 51 pieces, 128 pages.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S CLASSICS, No. 2."

Issued in answer to the demand for a second volume of high grade juvenile compositions. Uniform with the above. 48 pieces, 128 pages.

"STUDENT'S CLASSICS."

The 37 compositions in the book are from the best modern sources, and form a collection of rare excellence, variety, and interest. The pieces are of only moderate difficulty, being intended for the advanced pupil or the player of but medium skill. 143 pages.

"SELECTED CLASSICS."

No pains have been spared to make this the finest collection of modern pianoforte pieces published. The authors represented hold highest rank among recent modern composers, and the compositions in the book are those which have excited most interest and praise in musical circles, during the past year or two. The music is not heavy nor too difficult for the ordinary player. 33 pieces, 143 pages.

"CLASSIC FOUR-HAND COLLECTION."

The 19 four-hand compositions included in this volume have been selected for their combined attractiveness and musical excellence. Each duet is the work of one of the great modern composers, and the collection can be recommended as one of the most admirable of the kind ever published.

Each book is handsomely printed from specially engraved plates.

Each of the above Volumes, Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00. Postpaid.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston

C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

It stands as the fit, crowning memorial of an eminently gracious and beneficent life, says The Nation, in speaking of

The Singing Shepherd

And Other Poems

BY

ANNIE FIELDS

1 vol. 16mo, uncut, $1.25

The Nation adds: "Ever since, during the Civil War, she struck its poetic note more finely and sensitively than any one else in 'The Future Summer,' she has produced at intervals a series of poems more marked than those of any other American woman by evenness of texture and elevation of tone."

"They breathe the poet's broad sympathies: their tone is modern and clear." Jewish Messenger, New York.

"Many will be glad that Mrs. Fields has collected these poems, and the publishers have done her the credit of bringing out her work in a volume that is as nearly perfect in everything belonging to the printer's art as possible."—Boston Herald.

"No lovelier Christmas present can be made than Mrs. Fields's poems."—Woman's Journal.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

[NEW EDITION.]

Uplifts of Heart and Will.

In Prose and Verse.

By JAMES H. WEST,

Author of "The Complete Life," "In Love with Love," etc.

PRESS NOTICES.

London Inquirer.—Helpful and interesting. The fact that a second thousand has been called for will be some guarantee of such a book's claim to notice.

London Christian Life.—A book good for both old and young and for all alike.

Yale Literary Magazine.—The poems included in the book are impressive, many of them being of a high order.

Woman's Tribune.—Not dogmatic, deeply reverent, appealing to the divine within the human soul, calling it to the heights of larger helpfulness and blessedness.

American Hebrew.—Prose and verse that will surely appeal to an ever-widening circle of readers. It is gratifying to know that a new edition has been demanded.

Boston Herald.—One is very strongly impressed with the sincerity and reality of expression.

The Unitarian.—The earnestness, indeed the eagerness, of the writer cannot fail to quicken a helpful and elevating aspiration in the heart of every reader.

Cloth, bevelled, red edges, 50 cts.

For sale by booksellers or sent postpaid by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - Boston, Mass.

$ $ $ $ $ $ $

The Nimble Dollar

With Other Stories

—BY—

CHARLES MINER THOMPSON

With a Frontispiece Picture. 16mo, $1.00.

"ONE OF THE MERRIEST BOOKS we have seen in a long time. There is no apparent attempt to be humorous or witty; but the very spirit of mirth, healthful and refreshing, pervades these stories."—New York Christian Advocate.

"THAT VERY CLEVER STORY, 'The Nimble Dollar,' has been happily chosen by Mr. Thompson as the title of a collection of short stories, characterized for the most part by the same keenness, sagacity, and skill in human portraiture."—H. W. MABIE, in the Book Buyer.

"BRIGHT AND READABLE all the way through."—New York Evangelist.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

$ $ $ $ $ $ $

Some of our Latest Books

The Leisure of God,
And Other Studies in the Spiritual Evolution. By JOHN COLEMAN ADAMS, D.D. 12mo, 233 pages, $1.00.

The Church and Secular Life.
By Rev. F. W. HAMILTON. 12mo, 225 pages, 75 cents.

The Saviour of the World.
No. 7 of "Manuals of Faith and Duty." By CHARLES ELLWOOD NASH, D.D. 16mo, 105 pages. Net, 25 cents.

Wayside and Fireside Rambles.
Sketches, Reminiscences, and Confessions. By ALMON GUNNISON, D.D. With illustrations by Remington and Gibson. 12mo, 241 pages, $1.25.

The Purpose of God.
By JOSEPH SMITH DODGE, A.M., D.D. 12mo, 265 pages. Net, 75 cents.

Church Harmonies: New and Old.
A Book of Spiritual Song for Christian Worshippers.

Ranks with the best modern Hymnals in scope, variety, typography, availability.

Send for descriptive circular and sample pages.

Prices to Societies:

Cloth, 408 pp., $1.00	With Psalms & Chants, 456 pp., $1.10
Half Leather, 1.15	do do 1.25

Universalist Publishing House,

BOSTON: 30 West Street.

CHICAGO: 69 Dearborn Street.

Gift Books.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."
Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages.

"One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.
Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages.

"There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.
Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages.

"Rev. Marion D. Shutter is well known as an essayist and thinker of exceptional ability. This little volume ought to be in the hands of every parent and teacher, as Dr. Shutter has grasped in a notable way the soul of the new educational methods, and in these five chapters he employs them in a most striking manner."—The Arena.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,

174 High Street, - - - Boston.

For a CHRISTMAS GIFT

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Philosophical Union of the University of California, together with comments thereon by Sidney Edward Mezes of the University of Texas, Prof. Joseph Le Conte, and Prof. G. H. Howison of the University of California, has been published in pamphlet form by the Executive Council of the Union, and may be had of J. S. Lockwood, 6 Franklin Street, Boston. 50 cents. No student of philosophy can afford to be without this, one of the latest and most brilliant discussions on the idea of God.

"Which the Reader will find very Easy to read," is the title of the first chapter of "Mr. Midshipman Easy"; and this prophecy of Capt. Marryat's applies so well to the whole book, which so many thousands have found easy to read, that it is not surprising that Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons should issue a new edition on heavy paper, with excellent illustrations by R. F. Zogbaum. There is enough fighting, duelling, slaughter, and adventure in "Midshipman Easy" to furnish material for a library of dime novels. But there is more philosophy in it than a dime novel ever attains to. The boys of this generation will be pleased to see what sort of literature their fathers liked, and it will be safe to say that the boys of to-day will be very apt to approve of their fathers' taste.

The Magazines.

The Philistine for December has a poem by Rudyard Kipling, a vigorous article by Elbert Hubbard, and six lively pages of book notes.

The Charities Review, a journal of practical sociology, entered on its fifth year with the November number. Arrangements have been made whereby this magazine will devote a large amount of space each month to the special work of the National Conference of Charities and Correction. In this department Dr. John H. Finley, the editor of the Charities Review, will have the assistance of Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows.

A library and an art gallery combined is a bound volume of the Century Magazine. While some of its articles are necessarily ephemeral, it makes every year a solid contribution to American literature. "The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte," which is now being published, is an example. The illustrations are in the highest order of art. The volume for May-October, 1895, is before us, and will make in itself a handsome Christmas present.

It is only telling half the truth when we say that some of the best writers have made St. Nicholas. It is also true that St. Nicholas has helped to make some of the best writers, Mr. Kipling among the rest. The bound volumes for 1895 are already out. The very name of the magazine has a Christmas suggestion. History, poetry, athletics, entertaining stories, and beautiful illustrations make St. Nicholas incomparable. For particulars see the charming volumes. (Century Company.)

The Bookbuyer's Christmas annual is full of talk about the many books that crowd each other for the notice of holiday purchasers. The leading reviews are by well-known writers. Kenyon Cox writes of "The Abbey Shakespeare," Mrs. Sangster praises generously Mrs. Burnett's "Little Pilgrims," Thomas Nelson Page studies the claims of "Immortal Uncle Remus," while Grosvenor's "Constantinople," "The Art of Modern Living," "Victorian Songs," and "Another Jungle Book" are among the other books that receive particular mention. The holiday and juvenile books are fully described.

THE "NEW WORLD" FOR DECEMBER.—The current number of the New World might be called almost a Congregationalist number, since four out of the eight articles are by writers of that denomination.—Rev. W. E. Griffis, Prof. Paine of the Bangor Seminary, Prof. Starbuck of Andover, and Prof. Fairbanks of Yale. Three of the rest show the cosmopolitan character of the review, being by Prof. Albert Réville of the Collège de France, Paris, Karl Budde of the University of Strassburg, and Prof. Philipson of the Hebrew Seminary in Cincinnati. The book reviews are by Benn of Florence, Estlin Carpenter, Drummond, Upton, and Smith of England, Everett, Allen, Toy, and Rand of Harvard, Tyler of Cornell, Barber of Meadville, Vincent (Presbyterian), Slicer (Unitarian), Whiton, Paine, and Hincks (Congregationalists), Cone (Universalist), and Nash (Episcopalian). Surely, the New World is becoming an organ of the Broad Church. Prof. Philipson's account of the "Tendencies of Thought in Modern Judaism" is a very readable as well as able treatment of a very interesting subject. Prof. Réville writes of the "Miracles of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels," which he considers a quantité négligable by the historian, as they were by Jesus himself. Mr. Griffis writes sympathetically of that much misrepresented sect, or, rather, set, of Christians known as Anabaptists. "Anabaptism, so called, was really Christianity seeking to realize itself, as Christianity ever will, in forms most closely agreeing with the Master's teaching." In "The Pseudo-Athanasian Augustinianism" Prof. Paine contributes a subject of great importance, learnedly and broadly treated, to be followed by an account of New England Trinitarianism. Prof. Julia Gulliver contributes an ethical study of "Tito Melema," from "Romola." Prof. Starbuck, in "Popular Protestant Controversy," shows the injustice of A. P. A. attacks. Prof. Fairbanks writes of "Local Cults in Homer," and Karl Budde of "The Nomadic Ideal in the Old Testament." The guarantee fund of the New World gains constantly, but still needs additions, and should have them from all who wish to see liberal thought represented in this country by a strong and leading review.

W. H. L.

Charles Francis Barnard.
A Sketch of his Life and Work. By Rev. FRANCIS TIFFANY. With Portrait. 12mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Robert Browning.
Personalia. By EDMUND GOSSE. With Portrait. 16mo, 75 cents.

Life and Letters. By Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR. With Portrait and view of Browning's Study. Uniform with Browning's Works. Riverside Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo, gilt top, $3.00.

A biography of the very first importance, and withal a work that for readableness and the admirable discretion shown in the choice and arrangement of material has hardly a rival among contemporary memoirs.—Boston Beacon.

Thomas Carlyle.
The Correspondence of Thomas Carlyle and Ralph Waldo Emerson. Edited by CHARLES ELIOT NORTON. With Portraits. 2 vols. crown 8vo, gilt top, rough edges, $4.00; half calf, $8.00. Library Edition. 2 vols. 12mo, $3.00; half calf, $6.00.

The memory of a fine friendship.—Atlantic Monthly.

William Henry Channing.
By O. B. FROTHINGHAM. With a Portrait. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.00.

An admirable biography of one of the most philanthropic and saintly of men.

James Freeman Clarke.
Autobiography, Diary, Correspondence. Edited by EDWARD EVERETT HALE, D.D. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

One of the richest, most charming pieces of biography ever issued from the Boston press.—Christian Register (Boston).

Frances Power Cobbe.
Her Life told by Herself. With Portrait and View of her Home. 2 vols. crown 8vo, gilt top, $4.00; half calf, $6.50.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge.
Letters. Edited by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. With 11 Portraits and 4 other Illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo, gilt top, $6.00; half calf, $10.50.

Christopher Columbus,
And how he received and imparted the Spirit of Discovery. By JUSTIN WINSOR. With a great number of curious Portraits, Maps, Plans, etc. 8vo, gilt top, $4.00.

Dr. Winsor's work embodies the latest and most authoritative conclusions on the subject which the best European and American research and scholarship have reached. Dr. W. F. Poole.

Dorothea Lynde Dix.
By FRANCIS TIFFANY. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

The most interesting biography of a woman that has appeared these later years. A priceless addition to the lives of noble and saintly women.—Cyrus Hamlin, D.D.

Maria Edgeworth.
Life and Letters. Edited by AUGUSTUS J. C. HARE. 2 vols. crown 8vo, gilt top, $4.00; half calf, $6.50.

Miss Edgeworth's Letters give very interesting glimpses of famous persons in England and France,—Scott, Lady Byron, Hallam, Madame de Staël, Madame Récamier, the Duc de Broglie, etc.

Ralph Waldo Emerson.
By JAMES ELLIOT CABOT. With a new Portrait. 2 vols. crown 8vo, gilt top, $3.50; half calf, $6.00.

An admirable memoir, full of solid interest.—New York Tribune.

Such a character as his is the greatest and most beneficent of human achievements.—Christian Union (New York).

Ralph Waldo Emerson. In the series of American Men of Letters. By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. With a Portrait. 16mo, cloth, gilt top, $1.25; half morocco, $2.50.

The biography of the greatest American man of letters in the past by the greatest American man of letters in the present.—Edmund Gosse.

Ralph Waldo Emerson. His Life, Writings, and Philosophy. By GEORGE WILLIS COOKE. Fifth Edition. With a Portrait. 12mo, $2.00; half calf, $4.00.

Emerson in Concord. Written for the "Social Circle" in Concord, Massachusetts. By EDWARD W. EMERSON. With new Portrait. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.75.

The editing of all this material is admirable. . . . The volume will be one of the principal sources of knowledge about Emerson.—New York Evening Post.

THE LADIES' COMMISSION.
APPROVED CHILDREN'S BOOKS.
The following is a list of books approved by the Ladies' Commission on Sunday-school Books of the number which it has been possible to examine since October, 1895:—

"Battles at Home," by Mary Darling. (Reprint, by Lee & Shepard.) For children from twelve to fifteen.

"In the World," by Mary Darling. (Reprint, by Lee & Shepard.) A sequel to "Battles at Home." For older readers.

"A Boy of the First Empire," by Elbridge S. Brooks. (The Century Company.) The young hero is in the personal service of Napoleon, and the domestic side

The Genius and Character of Emerson. Lectures at the Concord School of Philosophy. Edited by F. B. SANBORN. With a Portrait. 12mo, $2.00.

Essays on Emerson's career, character, and philosophy, by W. T. Harris, F. B. Sanborn, Dr. Bartol, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, Mrs. Howe, George Willis Cooke, E. D. Mead, Julian Hawthorne, P. C. Mozoomdar, and others.

Emerson at Home and Abroad. By MONCURE D. CONWAY. 12mo, $1.50.

In many respects a model biography.—The American (Philadelphia).

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe.
By GEORGE HENRY LEWES. With a Portrait. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

One of the best biographies in English, or in any other language.—London Saturday Review.

Chester Harding.
A Sketch of Chester Harding, Artist, drawn by his own hand. Edited by his daughter MARGARET E. WHITE. With Portraits. 16mo, gilt top, $1.50.

Townsend Harris:
First American Envoy to Japan. By WILLIAM ELLIOTT GRIFFIS, D.D. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

Mr. Harris's Japan journals are contained in this book, and give it great historic value.

Harvard Graduates whom I have Known.
Sketches of Nathan Dane, Charles Lowell, George B. Emerson, Cazneau Palfrey, Presidents Dunster, Chauncy, Sparks, and Walker, and others. By ANDREW P. PEABODY, D.D. 12mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Harvard Reminiscences.
Brief sketches of Henry Ware, Josiah Quincy, George Ticknor, Edward Everett, John G. Palfrey, George Ripley, George Putnam, George S. Hillard, James Freeman Clarke, and many others. By ANDREW P. PEABODY, D.D., LL.D., Preacher to the University. 12mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Nathaniel Hawthorne and his Wife.
By JULIAN HAWTHORNE. With Portraits and Vignettes. 2 vols. crown 8vo, gilt top, $5.00; half morocco or half calf, $9.00.

An eminent English author pronounces this "the most important and interesting biographical work since Boswell's Johnson."

A Study of Hawthorne. By GEORGE PARSONS LATHROP. With a View of Hawthorne's Birthplace. 18mo, $1.25.

Lucy Larcom.
A New England Girlhood, outlined from Memory. By LUCY LARCOM. In Riverside Library for Young People. 16mo, 75 cents. Holiday Edition. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

The writer tells her story frankly and unaffectedly, and interweaves it with a singularly vivid picture of New England "as it used to be."—The Dial (Chicago).

Lucy Larcom.
Life, Letters, and Diary. By Rev. DANIEL D. ADDISON. With Portrait. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Abraham Lincoln.
An Essay. By CARL SCHURZ. With new Portrait of Lincoln. 16mo, gilt top, $1.00.

In outline and detail the finest study of Lincoln that has been written in the same space.—Christian Register (Boston).

Abraham Lincoln. By JOHN T. MORSE, JR. In American Statesmen Series. With Map and a fine Portrait of Lincoln. 2 vols. 16mo, gilt top, $2.50; half morocco, $5.00.

As a life of Lincoln, it has no competitors; as a political history of the Union side during the Civil War, it is the most comprehensive and, in proportion to its size, is the most compact.—Harvard Graduates' Magazine.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.
With Extracts from his Journals and Correspondence. Including "Final Memorials." Edited by SAMUEL LONGFELLOW. With Portraits and Illustrations. 3 vols. crown 8vo, gilt top, $6.00; half calf, $9.00; half calf, gilt top, $9.75.

It will take its place side by side with the standard Boswells of Literature.—Philadelphia Press.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. By F. H. UNDERWOOD. With a Portrait. 12mo, $1.50.

of the emperor's character is pleasantly shown. For boys over twelve.

"Two Maiden Aunts," by Mary H. Debenham. (Thomas Whittaker.) The story of two young girls of fifteen and seventeen, who have the charge of a little nephew. A sweet, wholesome book for girls about fourteen.

"The Nimble Dollar," by Charles M. Thompson. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) A collection of bright, clean stories, of moderate interest, for boys of twelve and upwards.

"Ruby's Vacation," by Minnie E. Paull. (Estes & Lauriat.) Another pretty story of the "Ruby Series." For girls from seven to twelve.

"An Island Refuge," by James Otis.

Samuel Longfellow.
Memoir and Letters. Edited by Rev. JOSEPH MAY. With Portrait. Cr. 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

John Lothrop Motley.
A Memoir. By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. 16mo, gilt top, $1.50.

Dr. Holmes's task has been the loving duty of an old and intimate friend, and his work is a very model of a brief literary biography.—George William Curtis.

John Ruskin.
His Life and Work. By W. G. COLLINGWOOD. With several Portraits of Ruskin, reproductions of his original Sketches, Views of Brantwood, etc., and with a Chronology, Bibliography, and Catalogue of his Drawings. 2 vols. 8vo, gilt top, $5.00.

The volume must have unrivalled interest for all students of the great writer's life.—New York Times.

Sir Walter Scott.
Familiar Letters of. With a fine Steel Portrait of Scott and an Autographic Plan of Abbotsford. 2 vols. 8vo, gilt top, $6.00; half calf, gilt top, $10.50.

In perusing these fascinating pages we seem to live Sir Walter's life over again along with him.—London Telegraph.

William and Lucy Smith.
By GEORGE S. MERRIAM. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.00.

It is the revelation of a unique life, and it is the record of a great love. It reads like an idyl.—The Christian Union (New York).

Celia Thaxter.
Letters. Edited by her Friends, A. F. and R. L. With Portraits. 12mo, gilt top, $1.50.

Henry D. Thoreau.
Thoreau: His Life and Aims. A Study. By H. A. PAGE. 18mo, $1.00.

Henry D. Thoreau. By FRANK B. SANBORN. In American Men of Letters Series. With Portrait. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Mr. Sanborn has done Thoreau's genius an imperishable service.—American Church Review.

Familiar Letters of Henry David Thoreau. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by F. B. SANBORN. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

George Ticknor.
Life, Letters, and Journals. With two Portraits and Heliotype of Mr. Ticknor's Library. 2 vols. 12mo, $4.00; half calf, $6.50.

As charming as Boswell's Johnson, Lockhart's Scott, Forster's Goldsmith, or Ticknor's own biography of Prescott.—Dr. R. S. Mackenzie.

Young Sir Henry Vane.
By JAMES K. HOSMER. With a Portrait, a Facsimile of a Letter by Vane, and a copy of the Great Seal of the Commonwealth under Cromwell. 8vo, gilt top, $4.00.

The best and most enlightened biography extant of a singularly interesting figure in a singularly interesting era.—The Churchman (New York).

Francois-Marie Arouet (Voltaire).
By JAMES PARTON. With Portraits, Illustrations, and Facsimile. 2 vols. 8vo, gilt top, $6.00.

The work is not merely a biography; it is historical; and it treats of an epoch of history full of political and religious significance.—The Christian Union (New York).

George Washington.
By HENRY CABOT LODGE. In American Statesmen Series. 2 vols. 16mo, gilt top, $2.50.

George Washington. An Historical Biography. By HORACE E. SCUDDER. In Riverside Library for Young People. With Portrait and Illustrations. 16mo, 75 cents.

It tells the story of the great patriot, soldier, and statesman with simplicity, sincerity, and completeness.—Christian Union (New York).

John Greenleaf Whittier.
By S. T. PICKARD. With Portraits. 2 vols. crown 8vo, gilt top, $4.00; half calf, $6.50; half calf, gilt top, $7.00.

The authorized biography of Whittier, including many letters.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by (Estes & Lauriat.) A short story of the troubles of the early settlers with the Indians. For boys over nine years.

“The Horse Fair,” by James Baldwin. (The Century Company.) A collection of stories of famous horses, celebrated in mythology, song, and story. For boys and girls from ten to fifteen.

“Stories and Poems for Children,” by Celia Thaxter. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) A book for children of all ages.

“The Story of a Cat and a Cake.” By M. Bramston. A story of incidents in the Thirty Years’ War and the siege of Nuremberg. For children from nine to fourteen.

“Two Little Pilgrims’ Progress,” by Mrs. F. H. Burnett. (Charles Scribner’s Sons.) A story of two little children at the World’s Fair, based somewhat on the original “Pilgrim’s Progress.” For children of nine years and upwards.

“Boris, the Bear-hunter: A Tale of Peter the Great,” by Fred Wishaw. (Thomas Nelson & Sons.) A story of a young Russian peasant who attracts the notice of the tsar, and shares in many adventures with him. For boys over twelve.

“Little Miss Phoebe Gay,” by Helen Dawes Brown. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) A story of child life for girls from seven to ten.

“Mr. Rabbit at Home,” by Joel Chandler Harris. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) A sequel to “Little Mr. Thimblefinger.” For children from nine to fourteen.

“The White King’s Daughter,” by Emma Marshall. (Macmillan & Co.) A story of the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Charles I. of England, written from the Royalist standpoint. For boys and girls over fourteen.

“A Knight of the White Cross,” by G. A. Henty. (Charles Scribner’s Sons.) A story of the time of the Wars of the Roses and of the Knights of Saint John in the Mediterranean. For boys over fourteen.

“Snow-shoes and Sledges” by Kirk Monroe. (Harper Brothers.) A continuation of “The Fur-seal’s Tooth.” For boys over twelve. Clean, wholesome, and interesting.

“A Jolly Good Summer,” by Mary P. W. Smith. (Roberts Brothers.) A sequel to “Jolly Good Times.” For children between nine and fourteen.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of “Books Received,” with statement of publisher’s address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Estes & Lauriat, Boston.
our Little Ones Annual, 1895. Stories and Poems for Little Ones. With original illustrations. Price $1.75.

From Ginn & Co., Boston.
Political Economy. For High Schools and Academies. By Robert Ellis Thompson, A.M., S.T.D. Price $1.00.

From D. Appleton & Co., Boston.
The Story of the Indian. By George Bird Grinnell. Illustrated. Price 40 cents.

From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.
Mars. By Percival Lowell. Price $1.00.

From the Massachusetts New Church Union, Boston.
Light on Current Topics. Bennett Lectures for 1895. Price $1.00.

From Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York.
The Reader’s Shakespeare. Vol. I. Historical Plays. By David Charles Bell. Price $1.50.

Youthful Eccentricity. A Precursor of Crime. By Forbes Winslow. Price 50 cents.

Samantha in Europe. By Josiah Allen’s wife (Marietta Hooley). Illustrated by C. De Grimm. Price $2 50.

From G. P. Putnam’s Sons, New York.
The Proverbial Philosophy of Confucius. Compiled by Forster H. Jennings. With Preface by Hon. Pom Kwang Soh. Price $1.00.

Sketches from Concord and Appledore. By Frank Preston Stearns. Price $2.00.

Nymphs, Nixies, and Nads. Legends of the Rhine. By M. A. B. Evans. With illustrations by William A. McCallough. Price $1.25.

The Gold Diggings of Cape Horn. A Study of Life in Tierra del Fuego and Patagonia. By John R. Spears. Illustrated. Price $1.75.

From Charles Scribner’s Sons, New York.
A Child’s Garden of Verses. By Robert Louis Stevenson. Illustrated by Charles Robinson. Price $1 50.

“IA.” A Love Story. By Arthur T. Quiller-Couch (Q.). Price 75 cents.

From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York.
Ekkehard: A Tale of the Tenth Century. By Joseph Victor von Scheffel. Illustrated. 2 vols. Price $2.00.

From Thomas Whittaker, New York.
Two College Boys; or, The Old Man of the Mountain. By Edward A. Rand. 75 cents.

From Macmillan & Co., New York.
Types of American Character. By Gamaliel Bradford, Jr. Price 75 cents.

From A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.
That Dome in Air. Thoughts on Poetry and the Poets. By John Vance Cheney. Price $1.25.

France in the Nineteenth Century. 1830-1890. By Elizabeth Wormeley Latimer. Price $2.50.

From the Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago.
Lovers Three Thousand Years ago as indicated by the Song of Solomon. By Rev. T. A. Goodwin, D.D. Price 75 cents.

From the Authors, Peoria, Ill.
Dr. Cavallo. By Eugene F. Baldwin and Maurice Eisenberg. Published by the authors.

British and Foreign Unitarian Association, London, England.
The Unitarian Pocket Almanack, 1896. Price 1 shilling.

From Philip Green, London, England.
Matins and Vespers, with Hymns and Poems. By Sir John Bowring. With a memoir of his life by Lady Bowring. Price 3 shillings, net.

From the Sunday School Association, London, England.
The Story of Religion in Ireland. By Clement Pike. With Introduction by Brooke Herford, D.D. Price 1 shilling.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.
Trankadillo. Mass in G. Words by F. E. Weatherly. Music by J. L. Molloy.

Old Acquaintance. Two-step. By Henry J. Repp.

Orange Country Fair. March. By Ullyses J. Aisdorf.

My Handsome Mary Ann. Words and music by J. Ed. Lakeman.

Hot Fill me a Flagon! Cavalier Song. For Tenor Solo, with Chorus. Words by Whyte Melville. Music by F. Boott.

Sorrisio d’ Amore. Arranged for Guitar by C. de Janon.

Satellite. Two-step. By S. F. Ayers.

At Easter-tide. Words by Clinton M. Scollard. Music by Gertrude H. Swift.

Before the Throne of Glory. Sacred Song. By George P. Nevin. Words by Frances V. Hubbard.

Like a Dream. Waltzes. By Eduard Holst.

Blessed be Thou, Lord God of Israel. By J. E. Trowbridge.

One Quiet Night. Christmas Song. Words and music by Beardsley Van de Water.

Christ Knows All. Contralto Solo in B-flat. Words by Rev. Richard Baxter. Music by H. P. Danks.

Bow down thine Ear, O Lord. Sacred Song in F. For Soprano or Tenor. By R. H. Phippen.

Trip Lightly. Waltz. By G. W. Bryant.

From Wm. A. Pond & Co., New York.
Gems for the Mandolin. By Louis Tocaben.

Spanish Serenade. A la Gavotte.

“Castanet Dance.”

Sogno Amoroso. Mazurka.

Castanet Dance. For the Piano. By Louis Tocaben.

Chiquita Gavotte. For the Piano. By Louis Tocaben.

“In Thee, O Lord, do I put my Trust.” Bass Recitative and Aria. By John B. Marsh.

Gloria in Excelsis. No. 4. For Mixed Voices. By Albert J. Holden.

Italian Salad. For Tenor Solo and Chorus of four Male Voices. By Richard Genée.

Under the Old Oak Tree. Words by Paul G. Backus. Music by Will H. Hickey.

Two-step Square. By George W. Wallace.

Tarantelle. By Stephen Heller. Revised and fingered by William E. Pecher.

Album Leaf. By Th. Kirchner. Revised and fingered by William F. Pecher.

Dream Singing. Words by Frances R. Havergal. Music by William Reed.

Light and Airy. Two-step March. By Rudolph Aronson.

Golf Club. Two-step. By F. H. Major.

Eighth Thousand

The Wise Woman

BY
CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM

16mo., $1.25.

“NOT RECENTLY, surely, has anything come from our popular authors that is more thoroughly gratifying than Miss Clara Louise Burnham’s pleasant medley of quiet social and domestic life. In its unruffled outward charm, and in its characters, it reminds us strongly of the graceful flow of ‘Miss Bagg’s Secretary.’”—Boston Herald.

“THE STORY IS BRIGHT and hopeful, full of the joy of youth and the joy of living.”—Transcript.

Other Charming Stories

By MRS. BURNHAM

Miss Bagg’s Secretary. A West Point Romance. $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Young Maids and Old. $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Next Door. $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

The Mistress of Beech Knoll. $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Dr. Latimer. A Story of Casco Bay. $1.25.

Dearly Bought. $1.25.

No Gentleman. $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

A Sane Lunatic. 16mo, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Sweet Clover: A Romance of the White City. 16mo, $1.25.

ONE FEELS after reading one of these romances as he does after a good dinner, that he has done something not only agreeable, but useful, and that things are decidedly better for it.—The Critic, New York.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

“Tell it Again”

A Series of Short Stories

BY EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

Susan’s Escort.
Hands off.
Col. Cliphsham’s Calendar.
A Safe Deposit.
One Good Turn.
Aunt Caroline’s Present.

These stories are artistically bound in white and color, and are among the best of DR. HALE’s short stories. Nothing can be more acceptable for a Christmas gift than a set of such entertaining tales.

Single copies, 40 cents. Set of six, $2.00.

For sale by booksellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

J. STILMAN SMITH & CO.,
3 Hamilton Place, - - - Boston, Mass.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS
men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times
DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT in NEW YORK
With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs.
Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott.
A Christian woman’s thrilling story of years of rescue work “In His Name,” alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. 64th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say “God speed it.” Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. Q—We Pay Freight to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Quitts. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW
ALWAYS CONTAINS THE RIGHT TOPICS,
BY THE RIGHT MEN,
AT THE RIGHT TIME.

THE TOPICS are always those which are uppermost in the public mind,—in religion, morals, politics, science, literature, business, finance, industrial economy, social and municipal affairs, etc.,—in short, all subjects on which Americans require and desire to be informed. No magazine follows so closely from month to month the course of public interest. All subjects are treated of impartially on both sides.

THE CONTRIBUTORS to the REVIEW are the men and women to whom the world looks for the most authoritative statements on the subjects of the day. No other periodical can point to such a succession of brilliant writers.

THE TIME when these subjects are treated of by these contributors is the very time when the subjects are in the public mind.

Among special features of extraordinary importance which the NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW has in preparation for 1896 is a series of articles by the Rt. Hon.

W. E. GLADSTONE

ON
THE FUTURE STATE,
And the Condition of Man in it.

The series will begin in the January number.

TYPICAL EXTRACTS from the VERDICT OF THE PRESS.

Ahead of any magazine this country has ever seen in the importance of the topics discussed and the eminence of its contributors.—Albany Argus.

No other magazine in the world so fully and fairly presents the opinions of the leading writers and thinkers on all questions of public interest.—Boston Journal.

In its discussions of current topics by distinguished writers it has no rival in the country.—Dubuque Herald.

It is always abreast of the world.—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

Not only the oldest, but the best of our Reviews.—Rochester Post Express.

There is no other magazine that approaches it.—N. Y. Sun.

Cannot be ignored by the reader who keeps along with current discussion.—Indianapolis Journal.

Continues to grow in interest. Its discussions of topics of present concern are marked by ability of the highest order, the most eminent representatives on both sides being chosen to expound their theories.—St. Paul (Minn.) Globe.

Numbers among its writers a larger list of men and women distinguished in the religious, literary, and political world than any other periodical of the kind. It should find a place in every household.—Ellendale (N.D.) Leader.

This Review is alive, and could almost be described as a PREVIEW.—The Christian Advocate (N. Y.).

Published Monthly, 50 Cents a Copy, $5.00 a Year.

The North American Review, 3 E. 14 St., New York.

THE Atlantic Monthly
FOR JANUARY, 1896
WILL CONTAIN
An Unpublished Note-book of Hawthorne
Written in 1839, while Hawthorne was, for a short time, Weigher and Gauger at the port of Boston.

The Country of the Pointed Firs.
A Story of Maine. By SARAH ORNE JEWETT, the author of “Deephaven,” and the best known of New England’s story-tellers.

The Emancipation of the Post-Office.
By JOHN R. PROCTER, Chairman U.S. Civil Service Commission. A forcible statement of the revolution to be brought about in our postal service by the recent consolidation of officers over large areas.

Congress Out-of-Date.
A presentation of the abuses due to the present method of convening Congress a year after its election, with some suggested remedies.

Pirate Gold. Part I.
The first instalment of a three-part story of romantic Boston life in the fifties, by F. J. STIMSON (J. S. OF DALE).

The Christian Socialist Movement of the Century.
By J. M. LUDLOW, so identified with the work of Maurice and Kingsley.

The Johnson Club.
By GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL. An interesting account of the meetings of a number of distinguished Johnson enthusiasts.

The Children of the Road.
By JOSIAH FLYNT. A study of children among vagrants, by an authority widely recognized.

The Fete de Gayant.
By AGNES REPPLIER. One of Miss Repplier’s most delightful sketches of travel.

As the result of a European trip made for the purpose of study in provincial France, Mrs. MARY HARTWELL CATHERWOOD will contribute a series of readable articles. The first is entitled

A Farm in Flarne.
Poems, Book Reviews, and the usual Departments

35 cents a copy. $4.00 a year.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.
4 Park St., Boston, Mass.

NO BETTER GIFT
For a friend fond of singing Hymns than
Hymns for Church and Home, with Tunes,
Edited by Mrs. MARY W. TILESTON and Mr. ARTHUR FOOTE, and published this fall.

Read what Rev. Edward A. Horton says of it in Every Other Sunday:—

“This is a volume of fine appearance, toward which the binder has given his best efforts. As for substance, it contains the results of Mrs. Tileston’s editing; and that is a sure guarantee of poetical excellence. The music has been edited by Mr. Arthur Foote, and his taste is unquestioned. Herein are treasures new and old. Aided by the experiences of the past, both Mrs. Tileston and Mr. Foote have endeavored to give churches what may be called a ‘working’ book of praise. We mean by that such a collection of tunes as embodies old and new, difficult and easy, stately and bright music. On the other hand, the hymns are of wide range, combining the austere of Watts with the gracefulness of Whittier. The best modern poets are represented in this collection, as well as the standard writers. Of course, the whole tone of the collection is congenial to the tastes and wishes of liberal Christians.”

The book is a square 8vo, of 512 pages, contains 801 hymns, and is handsomely and substantially bound in morocco.

Price $1.50, for which a copy will be sent to any address, postage paid.

A discount of 20 per cent. to societies introducing the book, and to clergymen, to whom a copy will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1.20.

American Unitarian Association,
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

THE YEAR BOOK
OF THE
Unitarian Congregational Churches
FOR 1896

will be published December 24, in season to reach those ordering it by the beginning of the new year, all lists being corrected as nearly as possible to that date.

Besides a calendar adapted for use throughout the country, and other matter belonging to an almanac, it contains lists of societies, ministers, associations, and conferences, and other important denominational information.

Price 20 cents, for which it will be sent to any address, postage paid. Packages of ten or more, 15 cents a copy. Members of the Association receive a copy without charge.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Jesus and the Men about Him. By CHARLES F. DOLE. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.

whose door stood hospitably open. Seeing him look up, the sexton beckoned; and Hermann mounted the steps. "Walk right in," the man said kindly; and, having nothing better to do, the boy followed the word of invitation, and entered the church. It was evidently some children's festival. A Christmas-tree occupied the place of the pulpit, and a few children were already in the front seats. It was warm and dark, the seats were comfortable; and, slipping into a corner of the pew, Hermann stowed himself out of sight, and fell asleep.

The Christmas exercises commenced. The children sang their carols, and the boy in the last seat heard them through his dreams. The organ pealed out the strains of "The Messiah." The children read in high, pleasant voices the words of their service. Still the lad dozed on, dreaming again and again of his departure from his father's house, his night with his worthless friend, and his wanderings about the street. Through his dreams came the sound of the music and of the children's voices; yet he could not wholly wake, but, restless in spirit, saw himself in a hundred places working and leaving work, yet always haunted by his father's face, as he had seen it last, gazing at him.

"I wonder if any of you know what it means to be a carpenter's son?"

There was no response from the children; but, if the superintendent had only looked far enough, he would have seen a figure in the back of the church start up, and, sitting erect, hold itself tense in the attitude of attention. Hermann was awake.

"It means," the voice went on, "to live all your life among such pleasant things. When I was very little, I had a friend whose father was a carpenter; and I used to think, when I went to see him, that he had the very happiest, jolliest place to grow up in. We were allowed to play among the shavings and to build houses of the pieces of wood. I never smell timber now but what I think of those days, and of the good times we had in that shop. And so, when Christmas time comes around, I love to remember that Jesus of Nazareth lived among just such simple surroundings, that there was nothing strange or unusual about his boyhood, that he had no 'superior advantages,' as we would say now, only the greatest of all blessings,—a home where we know love entered, and where there was honest work for him to do. A poet has sung of how Jesus worked at his father's bench, handling the saw and plane. I believe that he did, too. I am sure that he would never have refused his help to any one who needed it, last of all to his father. And, when his time came to go into the world and preach his gospel, he did not change much. He only gave without stint the best that was within him, and he did that as a youth when his message had not yet been given him. Through the long years that he worked at his father's bench the spirit of love was deep within his heart. We in our lives will only have the long working at the bench: we shall never be called upon to preach a gospel that will gladden the world for centuries. But, if we work with the spirit of love, willing and helpful in all our task, we shall surely be worthy to be called the followers of our Master, even the brothers of the Carpenter's Son."

The children sang another hymn, the Christmas-tree was stripped of its good things; and, with laughter and many cries of "Merry Christmas!" the service ended. But long before this Hermann had gone out into the night.

It was twilight when he reached the street. There had been a slight flurry of snow, and as yet the whiteness was unspoiled by the travel of many feet. As Hermann walked upon it, he felt that all the world was at peace. Then, as the clear, keen air struck him, the Christmas gladness that he had pushed away from him all day came with such a rush that he wanted to shout aloud. He did not walk: he flew over the ground. Every drop of blood in his veins tingled, and he forgot that he was hungry and tired. At length a horse-car passed, and he remembered that he was five miles from home. Putting his hand in his pocket, he pulled out eight cents. With a shake of the head, he thrust the money back in his pocket, and strode on. Only once in the long walk he stopped. Then he turned into a German bakery, and with his precious bit of money bought a little cake of which he knew his father was very fond. The smell of the pastry made him faint with hunger, but every cent went to the Christmas cake.

There were a great many people in the street; but he did not heed them: he was too anxious to get home. Only, when he went by the Christmas-trees, he had to walk a little slowly, that he might catch whiffs of their delicious fragrance. There would be one at home, he knew.

Night came on, and the stars shone down on him. He was very tired now; and he liked to fancy that he was following one of the stars, as the shepherds followed the star of Bethlehem. It made the way seem shorter to him.

The house was reached at last.

Suddenly all his strength seemed to go from him; and he had only a miserable feeling of wounded pride, of complete helplessness. The look of contempt that had been on his father's face when he had last seen him came back to haunt him. He who had felt himself so superior, had scorned his father's work and his father's ways, must return to him for shelter and for food. It was too humiliating. Without thinking, he put his hand in his pocket, and found the Christmas cake. Then the spirit of love in which he had been reared, and which had never wholly left his heart, came back stronger than ever before; and he buried his pride so deep that it should never come up again.

There was a light, a very faint one, in the shop. The blinds were closed, and business was over for the night. Opening the door with the key that was in his pocket, Hermann entered the room. Beyond was the kitchen, in which he knew his father sat; but he avoided looking there, and walked stealthily across the room to a corner where stood a half-finished piece of work. It was a picture-frame which he had started to make long ago. Taking up a chisel, he began, as quietly as he could, to cut into the wood.

"Who is there?" a voice called from the adjoining room.

Hermann did not answer, but went on with his work.

There was a sound of footsteps, the door was thrown open, and Otto Weber stood upon the threshold. He held a lamp in his hand; and, as he held it up that the light might fall upon the room, Hermann, had he looked, would have seen that the face was drawn with care and anxiety. But the boy did not raise his eyes. He was watching his chisel, trying to make it cut the wood, while all the time his hand shook. But he heard a little cry of love and joy and thankfulness, and his father was across the room and by his side.

Then the lad looked up. "Father," he said, "I have come back to thee. I have come back to be a carpenter's son."

THE LIGHT OF BETHLEHEM.

'Tis Christmas night, the snow
A flock unnumbered lies:
The old Judean stars aglow
Keep watch within the skies.

An icy stillness holds
The pulses of the night:
A deeper mystery infolds
The wondering Hosts of Light.

Till, lo, with reverence pale
That dims each diadem,
The lordliest, earthward bending, hail
The Light of Bethlehem.

—John B. Tabb,

For the Christian Register.

NANNIE'S CHRISTMAS EVE.

BY MARY C. BAIRD.

Papa had promised to take Nannie to the Christmas festival of St. John's Sunday-school. Nannie was only four, not quite old enough to be in sister Madge's class; and it seemed very hard that so much enjoyment should be missed on account of a trifle like this. Therefore, papa, who was Nannie's chief consoler, was to take her to the festival, although she had never been out in the evening before, and Madge was sure she would be tired and sleepy long before the exercises were over. Madge was ten, and wise accordingly.

Christmas Eve was cold and clear; and mamma buttoned Nannie up warmly in her white fur coat, tied the strings of the little white cap under the round, rosy chin, and smiled into the eyes that were dancing with excitement and anticipation, as she gave the good-by kiss. Nannie clung to papa's hand as she trotted along, carrying on a brisk conversation regarding Christmas-trees, Santa Claus, and the presents she expected to receive the next day; and in a few moments the church was reached.

Nannie had never dreamed of anything half so beautiful. The pealing organ, happy voices, the tree with hundreds of tiny, sparkling candles and innumerable gifts, and the heavy, delicious fragrance of flowers and evergreens pervading all,—it seemed as if it could not be real, it was too wonderful. Soon, however, she spied Madge, sitting with her class, sedate and self-possessed, and by her serious countenance rather discouraging Nannie's nods and smiles of recognition.

The service began; and in due time the roll was called, each child advancing to the chancel to receive the gift provided. Nannie watched with interest, as the children returned to their seats, displaying and comparing their presents, and, in her unselfish little heart, was happy in their happiness. Now only a few names remained, and the tree was not quite bare. Nannie's eyes grew wistful: it must be that some one had put something there for her. It could not be that she was the only child in the church left unremembered. The tears came, and she turned to papa for comfort; but papa was speaking to a friend behind him, and Nannie felt very much alone. Dr. Atkins, the dear old pastor, who was always so good to her, was waiting to announce the final carol. He smiled as he looked into the happy faces before him, and Nannie imagined that he was looking straight at her. Of course, he had not meant to leave her out, she thought, even though she did not belong to the Sunday-school. He was probably waiting for her to come to him, as the other children had done: she would go at once. She smiled back into the kind eyes, and, slipping from her seat, sped up the aisle, climbed the chancel steps; and, before any one could move, the baby figure, all in white, stood before the tall, gray-haired old pastor. He bent toward the child; and the church was very still, as all the other children listened eagerly, breathlessly. The little voice was clear and confident. "Nannie wants her pwesent." The good man lifted her in his arms. "Bless your dear heart! you shall have your present," said he, and turned to the tree once more. And Nannie's arms were full of treasures when she was given back to her father, who stood at the chancel steps waiting to receive her. As they went down the aisle, Nannie, too happy for words, hid her head on papa's shoulder and hugged him close. She had her "pwesent," she had been remembered as well as all the other children there; and she felt that, after all, it didn't make so very much difference whether or not she "belonged" to the Sunday-school.

HIS CHILDREN'S FRIEND.

Capt. Marryat, who, when he had reached middle age, lived the simplest possible life, overseeing his farm and entertaining his friends there, was a delightful companion to his children. He was like an elder brother to them, and yet seemed to lose none of their filial respect through such intimacy and freedom. When he was forced to punish them, the devices he chose were very original; and he seemed to pet them twice as much for the entire day after, as if to take the bad taste out of their mouths.

One day the nurse complained that two of the children had been very naughty in persisting in playing on their father's violin while the dressmaker had vainly attempted to try on their new gowns. The father lifted the two culprits one on each side of his bureau; and there he kept them sitting for a time, like two little images. At last they had enough of keeping still.

At another time the two came to him, as the dentist of the family; and the elder exclaimed, in high glee,—

"Here's somebody with a tooth to come out!"

He looked into the child's mouth, and twisted out the loose little peg. Then, turning to the elder child, he quickly pulled out one of hers, saying,—

"There! that's for coming to tell of it!"

Whatever the size of the culprit, she was always addressed with great formality while in disgrace. "Good morning, Miss Marryat," or "Good evening, Miss Marryat," was the portion of a little creature of six until such time as she chose to "be good."

He was an excellent counsellor to an unambitious child. If one pleaded, "It's of no use for me to attempt it: I'm not clever enough," he would exclaim:—

"Not clever enough! Don't talk such nonsense to me. You're no fool. You can do it if you choose, and I expect you to try and to succeed."

The children came to him with all their little troubles, always addressing him as "my father,"—a term he had taught them. One small creature of nine or ten appeared one day, with a very blank face, and showed him a rent in her dress.

"Oh, my father," she said, "what am I to do? Miss — [the governess] will be so angry. She will give me lessons to learn."

Her father took hold of the breadth, and tore the hole six times as large as at first.

"There," said he, laughing, "show her what I did!"

He was so fond of young people that on one occasion, when he was invited alone to a dinner, and the younger members of the party were asked to come in the evening, he was quite aggrieved.

"I don't want to go to dinner," he said to his chosen mates, in an injured tone. "They only ask me to amuse their guests. I am not going to 'talk clever' at the dinner table. I shall go in the evening with you."

And so he did, and was very happy, playing games and merrily taking his share of the forfeits.—Youth's Companion.

"CHOW-CHOW."

"Chow-Chow" was not a pickle, but a chicken, and a real funny one, too.

I made friends with him when he was no bigger than a robin. He was an only child. Of course, his mother had enough to do to pet and fuss over him. But he would leave her any time, when we called "C-h-o-w-C-h-o-w," and then "Chow-Chow-Chow-Chow" as fast as he could talk.

His mother was a beautiful buff Shanghai; but he was a long-legged Brahma, dressed in a speckled black and gray suit. As the days got chilly, in the fall, it seemed as if he suffered dreadfully from cold feet. He was always cuddling down in the warm feathers on his mother's back, even when he was a pretty big fellow.

One day I said: "Come, Chow-Chow, don't trouble your mother. I'll give you a good warming by the kitchen fire." I carried him into the kitchen, opened the oven door, and gave his cold feet a toasting. Oh, how he enjoyed it! He opened and shut his claws as he lay on my lap, and chow-chowed, and pecked at the buttons on my dress.

The next day it was pretty cold; and the first thing I heard, when I went into the kitchen, was a tapping at the window-pane. There was "Chow-Chow" on the window-sill, pecking at the glass, and holding up one foot and then the other. He was talking or scolding at the top of his voice.

I let him in. He went straight to the stove, and waited for me to take him in my arms and warm his feet. He seemed to think it was ever so much nicer than his mother's feathers.

One cold morning I was busy when he came in. The stove was very hot; and "Chow-Chow"—silly bird!—could not wait for me to attend to him. He flew up on top of the stove. Then he gave a scream, and landed on the table. That was the first and last time he tried to warm his feet without my help.—Our Little Homes.

1847

Rogers

Bros.

Make sure of the "1847" if you wish the genuine original Rogers Silverware.

Silver Plate that Wears

LOTUS PATTERN.

Meriden

Britannia

Company

MERIDEN, CONN.

208 Fifth Ave., NEW YORK.

For the Christian Register.
TO MY FATHER'S QUADRANT.
1899.—NOVEMBER EIGHTEENTH.—1895.

BY JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Poor homesick thing, I fear I do you wrong,
Far from the smiting of the eastern seas,
Here in my city house to hang you up,
My pride to flatter and mine eyes to please.

If you were conscious, you would ache and moan
Through every fibre of your mystic frame,
In this dull place to find yourself bestowed,
Nor hold me clear of treachery and blame.

How would you long to find yourself once more
Where the great waves go rolling up and down,
And the loud winds that spur their steaming flanks
The sailors buffet and their voices drown!

How would you wonder if the honest hand
That held you sunward on the heaving main
Had quite forgot the trick it knew of old,
And never so would manage you again!

Yea, verily, it was an honest hand,
Warm with the beating of an honest heart;
Never from stouter did good courage come,
Never from truer the good impulse start.

You were his guide on many a dangerous sea,
Through storm and darkness led him safely home:
As you to him, so he shall be to me,
Whatever seas I sail or lands I roam.

So onward sped, I cannot steer amiss,
Whatever darkness gathers round my way:
Let night come down, I set the faithful watch,
And wait it out until another day.
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.
BY ROBERT S. LORING.

The position of the Meadville Theological School has greatly changed during the last few years. Now that the Harvard Theological School is no longer a Unitarian institution, Meadville stands forth as the only theological school in this country, whose trustees, faculty, and students are, almost without exception, of our liberal faith. Founded to educate Western men for the Western ministry, Meadville to-day receives many of its students from New England, sends most of its graduates into Eastern parishes; and its alumni now occupy important positions throughout the country. In material matters, also, the school has gained. Owing to the gift of a valuable private library, and through the efforts of Mrs. H. P. Kidder, the school for the first time has an adequate number of modern theological works. Its endowment, though far short of what it ought to be, has nearly doubled in the last ten years, its faculty has been strengthened and increased, and it now can offer more and better courses than ever before.

This gain in position and resources should enable Meadville in the future to take a prominent place among the theological schools of the country. Now that the school has so much more to offer students than formerly, she can afford to demand more of them, both during their residence at the school and before they enter. With many other theological schools, she can require entrance examinations in such subjects as elementary ethics, logic, general history, psychology, and can insist that all the students who enter her doors shall be thoroughly prepared to profit by her teaching. In this way the professors can be relieved from the necessity of having to give some elementary instruction, and can devote more time to the advanced courses of the school.

Such a change in the standard of admission would make some of the courses now given much more beneficial to the students. Meadville can well boast of the fact that she offers courses in logic, ethics, psychology, political economy, and sociology, and thus prepares her men to apply their religion clearly and effectively to the every-day problems of life. In its practical spirit the school stands among the first in the country. But, helpful as these courses now are, they can be made even more valuable when students are required to give some time to their study before entering school.

Again, the school can now look forward to the time when it can increase the number of courses given and offer more than are required for graduation. This would make the school much more attractive to students, as it would allow them to a certain extent to choose the studies they wished to take. Such an increase in the number of courses would also make it profitable for a man to remain four years at Meadville, registering for his last year as a graduate student. It would also have a tendency to attract advanced students from other schools. Especially would this be the case if some one would found a few fellowships to be held by such graduates as might be approved by the faculty.

New courses on "The Apostolic Age," "The Middle Ages," "The Reformation," "Systematic Theology," and a second course on "Sociology" would be of great benefit to the school. A few of these are possible, even now, if the professors will only consent to give their present courses on alternate years, and thus allow themselves time to add new lectures in their several departments. Others, however, cannot be given, until the friends of the school so increase its endowment that it shall be able to add one or more new professors to the faculty.

In these three ways, then,—by increasing its faculty, its list of studies, and its entrance requirements,—Meadville can make itself more attractive to students of theology, and assume a higher place among the schools of theology; and all these things are possible for it, if the rulers of the school, its friends in the denomination, and its alumni will only work together.

BIRDS AND THE FARMER.
BY E. P. POWELL.

Not long ago there was held in Paris an international conference for the protection of birds useful to agriculture. Most of the European countries were represented; and some Americans also were present, taking, I believe, no active part in the discussion. The conference drew up a list of birds which it specially desired should be saved from destruction, and whose nests and eggs should be protected. This list was published, and is said to be very generally circulated throughout Europe. The aim is to secure a general adjustment of laws to cover the list given out as consisting of useful birds. The Scientific Review adds that it expects inside of three years to have all Europe organized to prevent the ruinous destruction of our feathered friends. The widow of Casimir Périer, late President of France, has begun a movement in Paris to second the work of the convention. It has the co-operation of the leaders of society and of fashion. On this side the water the government has been sending out bulletins carefully noting the comparative value of all birds to agriculture. The lists correct many notions that are prevalent, especially concerning owls and some of the hawks.

Many of the birds are quite capable of changing their habits of living, so that it is not well to pronounce from a single year's investigation exactly what they are capable of doing. I have seen decided modification in food habits going on with our most common birds. Ten years ago robins made it nearly impossible to raise cherries in Central New York. But the vast increase of berry gardens and fruit orchards has led them to desert cherries and currants almost entirely. Orioles were a pest to our gardens, destroying peas so that we could not grow them to any advantage. Now not a pea is touched. Hawks rarely approach grounds where king-birds are encouraged. Catbirds fight off blackbirds and sparrows. We have to study the changes going on, and we shall find our opinions of special birds quite altered from time to time.

Dr. Lintner lays the increase of worms in our elms to the driving away of insect-eating birds by the sparrow. This is probably true, although we had successions of many sorts of canker-worms and caterpillars before an English sparrow ever saw America. We change our modes of life constantly, and birds and insects adjust themselves to such alterations. Before we came to this country, the swift built in hollows in trees. It took to chimney-building as a suggestion from new environment. Now our small flues and coal-gas have almost wholly driven the bird back to old habits. Wrens and barn-swallows were able to enter the old-fashioned barns, and they did so to make their homes. But now our barns are constructed so tightly boarded that the birds have gone to wilder life. Few wrens visit us.

On the contrary, other birds are becoming familiar. In my boyhood, before twelve years of age, I never heard a catbird sing: they were to be met with in the wild berry fields, where they nested in thickets, and fed their young on raspberries. I think they seldom ever did sing. Their sharp scold gave them their name, from its resemblance to the snarling of a cat. But I can never forget the first time I heard a catbird sing. It was near the foot of our garden, where a thicket of plums tempted a pair to build. What delicious joy was in that song! Peering about, I found the brown singer, who at once squawked at me in its coarsest fashion. But I petted it, and loved it; and it soon understood me. Now half a dozen pairs are nesting every year close by my house. In late May I hear some morning a chirrup, and then a soft whistle. Ah! Miss Kitty has got back from the South. We go at it, whistling and jabbering to each other, like crazy lovers. They do little for the first day but talk to me. We have large berry gardens, and so our songsters have come closer to us. Twenty years ago a red-breasted grosbeak was as rare as a bird of paradise: now they are for a few weeks as common as robins. Robins, on the contrary, are on the decrease. This is probably because robins are blundering, clumsy house-builders, wholly lacking the wonderful art of concealment shown by their cousins, the catbirds. As houses grow quite near together, cats multiply, and robins are picked off. Crows also plunder their nests, because built in full sight of the rascals. I have seen a great black scamp sit on the side of a robin's nest, look in, and take his pick, while I was helpless to get at him, as, of course, he comprehended. The wood-thrush has become quite at home in our larger lawns of trees, and the hermit-thrush sings out his silver echo close by. The former does not hesitate to make friends of us, and sings from the ash-trees by the barn. The scarlet tanager made attempts from time to time to become one with us, but its superb plumage was too serious a temptation: it was shot by collectors. But this year once more I hear its queer "Ch-hat! ch-hat," monotonous, and rather tedious, but a sign that our most beautiful bird is making one more attempt to make its home in our orchards. It is a flame of fire,—something so tropical that it is difficult to believe it is not an Occidental stranger.

Of all our beautiful friends, I like none better than the indigo-bird. This is a rarely seen, deep-blue-all-over bird. It eats some berries, but is not a pest in any sense. I came on a nest in my red raspberry field, full of brown babies. The nest is not unlike that of the sparrow; but it is better built, and better stayed. This one is tied by cords to the canes, so that it cannot be capsized. It is a quiet bird, chirping like a song-sparrow, and singing a friendly but shy song, down at the edges of the orchard. The indigo-bird, with encouragement, should increase as our berry gardens increase.

Troublesome birds nearly all hunt in flocks,—the English sparrow, the blackbird, and the crow. Crows, contrary to common opinion, do not winter in the South. They collect by thousands hereabouts, feeding to the south of us, sleeping to the north. Their haunts are only a few miles apart; but they go in great cawing clouds at daylight to the feeding ground, stopping along the way, if desirable. They return at sunset. Where so many secure food enough is a marvel. They destroy a vast amount of mice, grasshoppers, and carrion. On the whole, the rascals are not a damage to agriculture. They pull corn in the spring to some extent, but do little other direct mischief. I find that the only real scarecrow is ears of corn tied on the top of poles. Offer them food, and at once they become suspicious. "Blackbirds haven't an honest hair in their heads" insists my neighbor behind the wood-lot. She lays, perhaps, too much to their charge; but, truly, this bird seems to love mischief for mischief's sake. It is curious to see their schemes for making a raid successful.

Hawks do less damage than that brave little fighter, the kingbird, who never fears to attack the hawk. The kingbird is apparently only an innocent fly-catcher; but, if you have bees, you will observe that he is busy much of the time flying over the bees' houses. He is really catching your honey-makers. Dissect one, and you will find that he has mainly fed on bees. Still, I like nothing better than to see one of these birds, smaller than robins, dart into the air, sailing as high as he pleases, and chasing a big thief clear out of sight. His manœuvres are those of audacity. He flies with undoubting determination into the face of the foe, dabs here, there, and everywhere. The slower-moving hawk does not know what to make of the little gunboat, and is shortly bewildered and quite rattled. It is not seldom, in cases of danger, that half a dozen kinds of birds chase a hawk, all led on by the commanding notes of the kingbird.

It is, of course, our policy to protect and encourage the insect-eaters, and to discourage the grain-eaters. This can be done by feeding and preventing the slaughter of the former. The orioles are troublesome in gardens, for they love green peas, cherries, and berries; but they eat vast quantities of worms and bugs. Their stay is brief with us, and one is rarely seen after the middle of July. The seed-eaters, such as the gold-finches and some of the sparrows, come later. But these live, for the most part, on thistle and other weed seeds, without molesting the grain-fields. The English sparrow alone rivals the blackbird for mischief. As soon as the wheat and oat fields grow yellow, they come in vast swarms, and, covering the fields, devour in a gluttonous way bushels of grain. They give us for this no compensation. The English poison them by scattering grain soaked in arsenic along the highway. The trouble with this method is that other birds are also liable to be poisoned, if not also fowls. It is impossible to catch them twice in the same way. Poison a few, and away go the rest. You may not kill, but you can drive them off with poison. It would not be a bad thing if we had a national sparrow-killing day annually. The pest is fast getting beyond control, as well as beyond endurance.

"Blessed is the man whom the birds love." This is true every way, for we have no allies and protectors like the birds. And it is also true that they learn to choose people, and take a fancy to special families. They learn to know where they are welcome and who is kind to them. I fancy the robins and catbirds feel a sort of joint ownership in my lawns. If I were to sell, would they stay with my successor? I have one catbird that comes into the English elm by my study balcony, and has a whispered conference with me almost every day. When bird time is over, the world grows lonesome. No amount of pleasant human companionship fully compensates. Our best way in planting is to count the birds in as members of the family, and plant enough for all of us.

Chronic
* Alcoholism

is a disease hard to cure, as is the morphine habit. Every organ of the body is affected. A continual demand for a stimulant is called for. Food ceases to gratify, in fact, often cannot be retained on the stomach, or when it is the vitiated blood ceases to absorb nourishment from it. Give such sufferers that greatest of food stimulants, blood-enrichers, flesh-creators,

Bovinine
a highly concentrated extract of the vital principles of lean beef, it is retained by the weakest stomach and nourishes quickly, so that with renewed tissue and returned strength morbid cravings vanish. Dr. J. B. Mattison of the Brooklyn "Home for Habitués" writes of Bovinine. "It is the best thing on earth of its kind. It is sustaining, nourishing, helpful in every way to patients of my special class."

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

For the Christian Register.
THE OHRISTMAS STORY.

BY HATTIE TYNG GRISWOLD.

Away, away in Bethlehem,
In ages that are gone,
Within a manger bleak and bare
A helpless child was born.
Jesus the little babe was called
By Mary, mother mild;
And a bright star the wise men led
Unto the wondrous child.

With gold and myrrh and frankincense
They fell down at his feet,
And worshipped him with solemn joy,
As fitting was, and meet.
For he the nations all about
From all their sins would save,
Glad tidings of great joy would bring,
And peace which all men crave.

And there in distant Galilee,
In lowly Nazareth town,
The little child grew to a man,
And wandered up and down,
Teaching the people as he went
Of new and better ways,
Of faith and love and charity,
Of holy prayer and praise.

To heal the sick, to feed the poor,
His work by night, by day,
To bid the sinner sin no more,
To cheer the mourner's way,
And still to tell where'er he went
The story of God's love,—
This was the message Christ of old
Brought to us from above.

Now far away from Galilee
And lowly Nazareth town,
We strive to tell the little ones
The tidings he brought down:
Peace on the earth, good will to men,
We chant it o'er and o'er;
And every blessed Christmas time
We prize the message more.

For love is still the best of life,
As Jesus taught of yore;
And little children never cease
To tell the tidings o'er,
Of Jesus and the deeds he did
By Jordan and the sea,
The words he spake in Bethlehem
And by blue Galilee.

RUSSIA AS IT IS.

BY SOPHIE FRIEDLAND.

The ringing of bells, the decorated streets, and the joyous faces of a people not disappointed in their hopes proclaim a holiday, an important day for Russia,—the anniversary of a new reign, and a reign full of promise for the future. So little was known of our young emperor but a year ago that we doubted whether the change in the government would bring "the better days" for which the Russian people have been looking forward. It was also known by the manifesto that the new czar would continue to act in the spirit of his deceased father, and the barometer of hope fell at once.

Lately it has become an open fact that the dying czar, fully aware of the liberal ideas of the young heir to his throne, and perhaps afraid of a sudden overthrow of the old system, which in our country would at first do more harm than good, made his son promise not to change the old government for five years.

Grand Duke Nicholas gave the promise; but Czar Nicholas evidently finds it hard, or, better, he does not intend, to change his liberal ideas and principles. Soon after his ascension to the throne a petition for more freedom in the expression of public opinion was made by our press; but it was refused. But what does this editorial in the St. Petersburg Gazette mean, of which I here translate a few lines:—

"For us men of the pen, whose wish it is to express the sentiments of the public, this year of the new reign has been of the greatest importance, and worthy to be immortalized. We shall forever remember it with gratitude. Not only was it acknowledged from the heights of the throne that the endeavors of the press are of the greatest use to the government, but we have also found an enlightened and highly material protection in the generosity of our young czar."

This means simply that, though we are not to have a free press before five years,—before the beginning of a new century,—there will henceforth be no danger in the bringing to light certain things at which a year ago it was impossible even to hint. Our papers, which mostly expressed the opinion of the foreign press, are beginning to have opinions of their own.

The law concerning the Jews, which has been so strongly in force during the reign of Alexander III., has not yet been retracted; but the order has been given to a great many governors to stop their banishment. Books that had to disappear from the libraries for the last thirteen years are once more on sale; and dramas like Tolstoi's "Power of Darkness" and others, which give a true picture of the ignorance of our people, have been the "vogue" here recently. The fact is that the ignorance of our people will soon be a matter of the past, for it is quite an open secret that the young czar intends to organize compulsory education.

With the election of the new minister for the home department the fate of our peasants seems assured; for no man is more qualified to be at the head of a department, which now, more than ever, has to solve the difficult problem of the present question, than Ivan Loginovitz Goremykine. Mr. Goremykine is neither a wealthy nor an ambitious man; and, if he now occupies what in Russia—now on the eve of great reforms—is considered the most important position, it is owing to his own merit. I have known Mr. Goremykine personally for many years, and I feel sure that he is the right man in the right place. He is highly educated, and reads six languages, which he speaks like his own. The papers are well informed if they acknowledge him hard-working and honest, as well as just and liberal.

There are air and light for all in the wide Russian Empire. All loyal subjects, whatever their race and religion, find a shelter under the mighty protection of the Russian eagle. In his centre he bears the holy knight gloriously conquering the dragon: under his outstretched wings he unites the arms of nations and countries which long since have flowed into one "Russian Sea." We wait and trust. Russian administration in our frontier countries will bring peace to divided and hostile interests, will destroy the power of the strong over the weak, and establish justice everywhere. Oppression and arbitrariness have seen their last days. There is a difference between an open combat and slow resistance: the zealous endeavors of a well-meaning government cannot but win at the end; and the time is not far off, if it has not come already, that the different opposing elements in our country will submit to its wise and liberal judgment. It seems to me that particularly in such an administration the new courts of law are called upon to be one of the principal leaders in our frontier countries.

Foreigners can hardly realize how troublesome the Poles and Germans have been and still are in the history of our country; and it is only now, thanks to the new reforms, that they are kept from openly revolting. I hope, with Mr. Muravjev, that the time will come when the different races, united under the Russian sceptre, will have reason to agree that an absolute government, with a wise and liberal monarch at the head, is not the greatest evil. Much depends upon our statesmen, and we are thankful that the men who have lately been elected are as just as they are honorable. If report says true, the government of Mr. Pobedonosseff, the director of the Synod, the man most feared, most hated on account of his fanaticism and his influence over the late czar, is at an end. If Lutherans, Catholics, and Jews have had less liberty in Russia than in other countries, it was owing to this influence; but Czar Nicholas has lately asked him whether he considered religious persecution a divine law.

St. Petersburg, Russia.

SIGMODENTS.

Chicago had a visit the other day from a family of foreigners whom no one had ever seen so far north before. They had come smuggled in a big bunch of bananas from Cuba, and had their ride free. They were sigmodents, a species of animal belonging to the rat family, but only living in the torrid zone. There were a mother and her six cunning little babies. When they were disturbed, the little ones jumped upon their mother's back, and clung to her fur with their little hand-like feet; and for further protection they twisted their tails around their mother's tail. Very unfortunately, in the excitement of discovering the little creatures, the mother and five little ones were killed. A lady who happened to be present rescued the other one and took it to her home.—The Evangelist.

Charities and Reforms.

A representative committee, with Robert Treat Paine as chairman, will draft a law, and appeal to the next General Court for such legislation as will prevent the classification of unfortunates with criminals.

Edward Everett Hale is to give a course of readings at the Old South Meeting House for the benefit of the Central Lend a Hand Office. Two of the readings will be on "Recollections of People I have known," and will be given Thursday, December 26, and Saturday, December 28, at four o'clock P.M. At the third, on Monday, December 30, he will read "Col. Clippam's Calendar" and "Susan's Escort."

HELP FOR AN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL NEEDED.—A few years ago an industrial school for colored youth was started in Mayesville, S.C., in a region where the colored people outnumber the whites, and where there is gross darkness, ignorance, and poverty. An industrial education is the best way of overcoming such conditions. This the Lowry School is trying to furnish. Mr. Joseph T. Walsh, for many years a member of the South Carolina board of education, has made an appeal for this school in the Boston Transcript. A debt of a few hundred dollars on the school plant must be met before the 1st of January, or the doors must be closed. Contributions may be sent to William Lloyd Garrison, 35 Federal Street, Boston.

THE BEAUTY AND BRILLIANCY of GOLD OR SILVER-WARE = IS EVERLASTING WHEN SILVER
ELECTRO SILICON
POLISH IS USED EXCLUSIVELY.
IT NEVER SCRATCHES,
NEVER WEARS,
IT'S UNLIKE OTHERS.
SOLD EVERYWHERE—
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., NEW YORK.

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.
ONE OF MANY REASONS WHY.
If it had no other original designs than the simple, practical one of re-wicking here illustrated, the

Miller Lamp

Might reasonably claim superiority. But there are several others you can learn about by sending for our ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, free to all addressing

EDWARD MILLER & CO.,
Mill and Factories, Meriden, Conn. 63 Pearl Street, Boston.

FIG. NO.
1.	3	to	6	yrs.,	$5,	$6,	$8,	$10,	$15.
2.	3	"	8	"	$4,	$5,	$6,	$8,	$10.
3.	3	"	12	"	$5,	$6,	$7,	$8,	$10.
4.	3	"	8	"	$10.
5.	4	"	8	"	$10,	$12,
6.	3	"	10	"	$6,	$8,	$10,	$12.
7.	3	"	12	"	$5,	$6,	$7,	$8,	$10.
8.	3	"	8	"	$5,	$6,	$7,	$8,	$10.
9.	3	"	12	"	$5,	$6,	$7,	$8,	$10.
10.	3	"	8	"	$5,	$6,	$7,	$8,	$10.

MESSRS. A. SHUMAN & CO. beg to invite the public to an inspection of their splendidly arranged department for the exposition of children's fashionable habiliments.

Some of the most fetching garments yet produced for little men are to be found in this department. Beautiful and substantial materials of the Messrs Shuman's direct importation, as well as their purchases from the best American mills, are used exclusively.

It is universally admitted that the Messrs. Shuman's Juvenile Outfitting Parlor is the best lighted, best ventilated, and the largest department devoted exclusively to the sale of garments for small children in this country, if not in the world.

A. SHUMAN & CO.,
Washington and Summer Streets.

Emblematical Group,
Juvenile Department, Shuman Corner.

THE MAN OF NAZARETH.

A cloud received him out of sight,
Even so; and then men knew no more
The human presence warm and bright,
As he had walked the earth before;

The preacher of the mountain side,
Teaching the kingdom's reign within,
Strong in rebuke of hardened pride,
Yet pitiful of conscious sin.

But, sceptred now and throned afar,
They watched in dread his swift return,
To see before his judgment bar
The earth dissolve and heavens burn.

The gathered clouds of centuries lift,
No king in wrath descends to reign;
Yet, king-like, through the shining rift
The Man of Nazareth comes again.

O Friend and Brother, draw more near,
The while thy festival we keep;
Diviner shall our lives appear,
Held fast in thy high fellowship.

—Frederick L. Hosmer.

Christmas, 1890.

REV. OBED ELDRIDGE.

Rev. Obed Eldridge, pastor of the Third Parish Unitarian Church, West Dedham, died Saturday night. He was born in Sandwich, Dec. 6, 1838. He was educated in the public schools of his native town, and learned the trade of nailer. While following his trade, he devoted his evenings to studying for the ministry. He was ordained at Dighton, Mass., in 1881, and preached in the Unitarian church in that town, going from there to Northboro, and from that place to West Dedham. He was active in temperance work, and was a member and officer of the Dedham No-license League. He was also a member and the chaplain of Constellation Lodge, A. F. & A. M., Dedham, and of the Knights of Honor Lodge in Dighton.—Boston Transcript.

MENTAL HEALING.

It remains yet to be proven that "Christian science," "mind cure," "faith cure," or whatever it may be called, has yet produced any cure which is not the result of the direct action of the mind on the body. Undoubtedly, we have not appreciated the scope and power of the mind in relation to the body or the quickening psychical or magnetic influence which may come through another personality. In an article in the Nineteenth Century for October Dr. Berdoo of London says of faith healing: "It is entirely of a scientific order, though its domain is limited. To produce its effects, it must be applied to those cases which demand for their cure no intervention beyond the power which the mind has over the body. Herbert Spencer points out that muscular power fails with flagging emotions or desires which lapse into indifference, and, conversely, that intense feeling or passion confers a great increase in muscular force. It is brain and feeling generated by the mind which give strength to the person who thinks strongly. A gouty man, who has long hobbled about on his crutch, finds his legs and power to run with them, if pursued by a wild bull. The feeblest invalid, under the influence of delirium or other strong excitement, will astonish her nurse by the sudden accession of strength she may exhibit."

WHAT BOYS AT RUGBY LEARN.

The boys of Rugby School in England are required to read the newspapers in order to familiarize themselves with the geography of the world and the great events of the day. The sort of education they are expected to get from the newspapers is indicated by the following examination paper used recently in the school:—

1. Describe the east and west coast routes to Scotland. Give an account of the "Race for the North."
2. Where are the following places, and with what recent events are they connected: Foo Chow, Madagascar, Sofia, Cuba, Congo?
3. What do you know of the following: Khama, Col. Shervington, Nasrullah, Khan, Sher, Afzul?
4. Explain the cabinet, privy council, spiritual peer.
5. What was the business done in the last session of Parliament? Who are at present speaker, colonial secretary, foreign secretary? What offices are held by Mr. Goschen, Lord Lansdowne, Mr. Long?

6. An account of the races for the America's cup.

7. What are the present difficulties in Armenia? Describe the situation.—Transcript.

Here and There.

A memorial tablet to Mary, Queen of Scots, has just been placed in Peterborough cathedral. It has been subscribed for by ladies in England bearing the Christian name of Mary.

Greek finances are in a worse condition than those of the Indian government. The credit of Greece is so low that its coin, nominally equal in value to that of the Latin Union, is worth only a little over half as much.

As a curious relic of the feudal laws of the Middle Ages, when the perquisites of the rulers embraced much more than they do now, it is a fact that to-day the queen, as sovereign of England, may claim the head or whalebone half of every whale and sturgeon caught in British waters.

Germany carries on a large trade in the rearing and exporting of canaries; and the largest establishment in the world for the breeding of these creatures is situated within the domains of that empire, away up among the Hartz Mountains of Prussia. From this and the few surrounding but much smaller nurseries, no fewer than one hundred and thirty thousand birds are despatched every year to the United States and Canada; while in the same time at least three thousand go to Great Britain, and about two thousand go to Russia.—Harper's Round Table.

Science.

Attempts to construct overland telegraph lines along the river Amazon in Brazil have been abandoned, owing to the rapid and dense growth of the tropical forest. A cable will now be laid in the bed of the river, and the steamer "Faraday" will be used for the purpose.

The anthropologists of the national government are engaged in one of the most interesting expeditions ever sent out by their department. It is intended to invade the strongholds of the Seri Indians, on a rocky island in the Gulf of California, which has never before been visited by white men.

"There is," says the Chicago Inter-Ocean, "a remarkable difference in the density of mahogany as it comes to the cabinet-maker. A square foot of Cuban mahogany one inch thick weighs, on the average, six pounds. A like piece of San Domingo mahogany weighs four pounds, and a like piece of Mexican mahogany weighs two and one-half pounds. The difference in weight between old pieces of San Domingo mahogany taken from the wreck of antique furniture and a piece of seasoned new San Domingo mahogany is much less than might be expected."

Somatose

A Scientific Food,

consisting of albumoses, the elements necessary for nutrition—Is palatable, and stimulates the appetite—Is easily digestible, and does not overtax the stomach—Is readily assimilated, producing a rapid gain in flesh and strength—Is not expensive, as only a small quantity is necessary because of its concentrated nature.

Supplied in 2-oz., ¼, ½, and 1-pound tins; also the following combinations:

Somatose-Biscuit.—(10% Somatose). Palatable, nourishing—a valuable addition to the diet.

Runkel Bros' Somatose-Cocoa (10% Somatose), for nursing mothers, invalids and convalescents. A desirable addition to the diet of children, and a pleasant beverage, both nourishing and stimulating, for table use.

Runkel Bros' Somatose-Chocolate (10% Somatose), for eating and drinking.

All druggists. Send for free descriptive pamphlets.

Schiffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents.

$11 GIFT.

At the risk of annoying our friends by too constant repetition, we nevertheless wish again to emphasize the fact that the prices we quote at our Annual Christmas Sales are the lowest of the entire year.

Here, for example, is a $15 Music Cabinet offered at $11. No lower price than this is possible during the other eleven months.

Understand that this is a four-shelf cabinet, superbly constructed, with oval plate glass mirror and outside shelf. The gilded mouldings in the style of the Empire, shine out from the surface of the dark finish of mahogany.

The top is guarded by a gallery. The carving on the door is in full relief. The lines of this cabinet are as graceful as the most critical purchaser could desire.

It is really exceptional value.

Paine Furniture Co.,
48 CANAL STREET.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A party of limited numbers will leave Boston Monday, February 24, for a

Grand Tour
—TO—
JAPAN AND CHINA.

The tour through Japan will be much more comprehensive than is usually made, and there will be longer sojourns at all the chief cities and points of interest. In China there will be visits to Hong Kong, Macao, and Canton.

In connection with the foregoing a tour through the HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, with visits to Honolulu, Hilo, the volcano of Kilauea, etc. December 10, January 7 and 23, and on other dates in February and March, Tours to California.

January 15—Special Tour through the Mediterranean Countries.

January 23 and February 13, Tours to Mexico.

March 21, May 16, May 23, June 20, and July 4, Tours to Southern, Central, and Northern Europe.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

POWDER POINT SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Elementary and advanced classes. Individual teaching. Scholarships.

F. B. KNAPP, S.B., Duxbury, Mass.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS.

For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin

BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Scraps of Travel.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day. Popular Lectures. Paper, 10 cts. each. The ten for 75 cts.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "Blessed be Drudgery," "A Year of Miracle," etc.

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

Published in three styles:

Gift edition, fine cloth, wide margins, 60 pages, 50 cents.

Paper, ornamental, 26 pages, 15 cents. (In white, if desired.)

Cheap edition, 6 cents (ten copies for 30 cents, net).

"In 'The House Beautiful,' Rev. Wm. C. Gannett describes, with a rare combination of good sense and poetic insight, the essentials of a beautiful home, giving to flowers, books, and guests, for instance, their due place in its furnishing, while love is the bond that binds all together in gracious influence."—Literary World.

"It is on the side of sincerity, quietness, and simplicity. Meets with our entire approval."—The Critic.

"Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on 'The dear Togetherness' is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. Our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and, if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so."—The New Unity.

For sale by booksellers or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents.

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.
3. Reaping Time.
4. Called to be Saints.
5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)
6. The Religious Situation.
7. The Forward Movement of Unitarianism. (By Rev. George Batchelor.)
8. Our Divine Partnership.
9. Dr. Gordon's Book, "The Christ of To-day."
10. Thanks that I can be Thankful.
11. The Morning Song of the Creation. (By Rev. Robert Collyer.)
12. Some Lessons from the Life of O. B. Frothingham.
13. Giving.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.
2. The Beseeching God.
3. Christian Unity.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

"DIRT IN THE HOUSE BUILDS THE HIGH-WAY TO BEGGARY." BE WISE IN TIME AND USE

SAPOLIO

Pleasantries.

"What do you think of the 'Origin of Species'?" asked one man. "I have never read it," was the other's reply. "In fact," he added, "I am not interested in financial subjects."—Transcript.

"I cannot understand ze language," said the despairing Frenchman. "I learn how to pronounce ze word 'hydrophobia,' and zen I learn zat ze doctors sometimes pronounce it fatal!"—Chicago Tribune.

A little girl "in the fourth grade" was troubled in school with the twitching of the muscles of the eye. Being asked what was the matter, she said, "I've got the hiccoughs in my eye."—Congregationalist.

"Dear me," cried the nurse, "the baby has swallowed my railroad ticket. What shall I do?" "Go and buy another right away," returned the mother. "I am not going to let the conductor punch the baby."—Comic Cuts.

A little fellow, who had his wits about him when the contribution plate was passed at church, administered a rebuke to his mother, who on the way home was finding fault with the sermon. "Well, mother," he said innocently, "what could you expect for a cent?"—Selected.

A mother, commending her daughter for a situation, was asked if she was an early riser. "An early riser!" she exclaimed. "Well, I should think so! Why, she's up in the morning and has breakfast ready and makes all the beds before any one else is up in the house!"—Youth's Companion.

A small boy demanded an explanation of the names applied to the four classes of the college course. He listened attentively, and sat buried in thought for some time. At last he asked anxiously, "Papa, if you are James Little, Sr., and I am James Little, Jr., will my son be James Little, Sophomore?"

An Early Intimation.—"Johnny," said the boy's father, "I suppose that you are going to hang up your stocking next Christmas." "No, I'm not," was the reply, after some thought. "Why not?" "Because," he answered, looking his father straight in the eye, "you couldn't put a bicycle in my stocking."—Washington Star.

Cholly: "Me good fellah, would you kindly arwest and fine me for shooting deer out of season?" Game Warden: "How many did yer shoot?" Cholly: "I didn't shoot any; but, if you'll arwest and fine me for shooting six deer, and have it put in the Adiwondack News, I'll take fifty copies of the papah and give you fifty dollars bonus."—Judge.

A reporter for the Cincinnati Tribune lately overheard a dialogue between two suburban gentlemen. "How did your daughter pass her examination for a position as teacher?" asked the first man. "Pass!" was the answer. "She didn't pass at all. Maybe you won't believe it, but they asked that poor girl about things that happened before she was born."

One Sunday morning not long ago a certain young boy was playing with a small step-ladder. His mother saw what he was doing, and asked him what he was playing. "Oh," he said, "I'm playing this step-ladder is my bicycle." "But," replied his mother, "don't you know that it's wrong to ride a bicycle on Sunday?" "I know, mamma, but I'm playing I'm a Jew."—Life.

ADVICE TO MINISTERS.

The late Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's wit was one of his most striking characteristics; and it was conspicuous in his counsels to students, a fine selection of which may be found in "Personal Reminiscences of Charles Haddon Spurgeon," which has just been published. Some of the "hints" which are recalled to memory might certainly with advantage be borne in mind by ministers, both young and old. As, for instance, "Mind you avoid inappropriate texts. One brother preached on the loss of a ship with all hands on board from 'So he bringeth them to their desired haven'; and another, returning from his marriage holiday: 'The troubles of my heart are enlarged. Oh, bring me out of my distress!' Mind your illustrations are correct. It will never do to describe Noah, as one did, sitting outside the ark, reading his Bible: always get the true meaning of a text. One local preacher took 'He for our profit,' and preached on 'The Prophetic Office of Christ.' Mind your figures of speech are not cracked. Don't talk like the brother who said, 'I fly from star to star, from cherry-beam to cherry-beam.' Get among your people, or somebody may be saying of you, as one old lady said of her minister, that he was invisible all the week and incomprehensible on Sundays. Shun all affectation in the pulpit, and mind you never get into the goody-goody style. One of this sort said, 'I was reading this morning in dear Hebrews.'"

Timely Warning.

The great success of the chocolate preparations of the house of Walter Baker & Co. (established in 1780) has led to the placing on the market many misleading and unscrupulous imitations of their name, labels, and wrappers. Walter Baker & Co. are the oldest and largest manufacturers of pure and high-grade Cocoas and Chocolates on this continent. No chemicals are used in their manufactures. Consumers should ask for, and be sure that they get, the genuine Walter Baker & Co.'s goods.

WALTER BAKER & CO., Limited,
DORCHESTER, MASS.

For Holiday Gifts!

We have very effective The patterns of "Addison."

Shoulder Watches in gold and silver enamels; a highly artistic line in gold and sterling silver. Also in decorated oxidized steel, as well as plain black cases.

Ecclesiastical Designs

Our unquestioned guarantee with every watch,
THE WATERBURY WATCH CO.,
Send for Catalogue No. 150 Waterbury, Conn.

HOMESEAKER'S EXCURSION.

Farm, Field, and Fireside, and Western Rural Popular Colony Plan at GREEN COVE SPRINGS, FLORIDA

Best lands and healthiest location in the State. Cheap homes for the industrious. Easy terms of payment. Lowest round-trip rate ever offered from the East. Excursion leaves Boston Jan. 7, 1896, and New York the following day. For full information, maps, plats, terms, etc., enclose stamps to Farm, Field, and Fireside, 215 Madison St., Chicago, Samuel Wilson & Son, Eastern Agents, 379 Broadway, New York, or

BURNHAM & CROSS, Excursion Agents,
35 Congress St., Room 33, Boston.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANSVILLE,
New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

EBBITT HOUSE,

WASHINGTON, D.C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Popular Prices. Regular rate $4.00 per day up. Fifty rooms on the sixth floor, with steam heat and electric light, reduced to $2.50 and 3.00 per day. Fifty rooms on other floors reduced from $4.00 to $3.50 per day. Parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates. Special rates for the Army and Navy Officers and the Clergy.

THE BRAINERD & ARMSTRONG SINGERS
2 Union Street, New London, Conn.

AT MARYLAND JOHN H. PRAY, SONS & Co.,
FACTURERS CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY,
PRICES. 658 WASHINGTON ST.,
OPP. BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.

CHURCH CARPETS

New England Mutual

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Post-office Square, Boston, Mass.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

All forms of Life and Endowment policies issued. ANNUAL CASH distributions are paid upon all policies.

Every policy has indorsed thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute. Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec.

THE BEST SILVERWARE

in quality and finish.

New and desirable patterns

many of which cannot be found elsewhere.

Bigelow,
Bernard & Co.
501 Washington St. cor. West.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A party will leave New York Wednesday, January 15, on the favorite steamship Werra, of the North German Lloyd Line, for a

SPECIAL TOUR

THROUGH THE

Mediterranean Countries,

Including Southern Italy, the Island of Sicily, Tunis, Algeria, and Southern Spain.

Incidental visits to Naples, Pompeii, Vesuvius, Capri, Sorrento, Rome, Taormina, Catania, Syracuse, Girgenti, Palermo, Tunis, Carthage, Boné, Hammam-Meskoutine, Constantine, Biskra (on the borders of the desert of Sahara), Batna, Lambessa, Timgad, Setif, Kharata, Gorge of the Chabet-el-Akhira, Bougie, Algiers, Blidah, Tlemcen, Oran, Malaga, Grenada, Gibraltar, etc.

A party will leave New York March 21, and, connecting with the above at Gibraltar, make an extended Tour through Spain, Portugal, France, etc.

March 21, May 16, May 23, June 20, and July 4.—Tours to Southern, Central, and Northern Europe.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines, also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired. (Special circular for the Mediterranean Tour.)

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,

296 Washington Street, opposite School St., Boston.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building.

BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

GEO. H. ELLIS,

Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job
Printing.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1895.

NUMBER 52.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes: The War Clang,	847
Retrospect and Prospect; Misplaced Chivalry; Beginning with the Children,	848
BREVITIES,	849
PRO AND CON.
Hymns for Children; The Norwegian System, . .	849
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
A Name above Every Name, by Henry A. Miles,	849
A Himalayan Settlement, by P. C. Mozoomdar; Holland and its People, by Rev. Henry G. Spaulding,	850
New York Letter; "New World" Guarantee Fund,	851
National Alliance of Unitarian Women; American Unitarian Association,	852
O. B. Frothingham; Rev. Obed Eldridge, . . .	861
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	851
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	853
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	853
THE PULPIT.
The Greater Puritanism, by Rev. Francis G. Peabody,	854
SERMON GLEANINGS.
A Little Child shall lead them, by Rev. T. D. Howard; Union of Young People,	855
LITERATURE.
Dr. Reynolds's Book; Other Book Notices, . .	856
Recent Poetry; Miscellaneous; Magazines; Literary Notes; Books Received,	857
THE HOME.
Prince Bladud, by Fred Myron Colby; That Blessed Old Cat, by Sydney Dayre,	858
The Echoes of a Chance Remark, by Alice W. Rollins,	860
POETRY.
Good-by, Old Year, Good-by! by Rev. William Brunton,	849
Envoi,	850
Divine Discontent,	854
One Mother,	858
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	860
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	860
PLEASANTRIES,	862

SPECIMEN COPIES of the Christian Register will be sent free for four weeks to any one wishing to examine it. Application should be made with address in full to

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Editorial.

WITH the march of modern civilization many provincial peculiarities disappear which are found to be obstructive to the intercommunication of nations. A new standard of ethics is gradually wrought into international law. People in England, Europe, and this country wear essentially the same style of clothing. Beef and corn raised in the United States are eaten in England and on the continent. The barrier of language still remains. In music, fortunately, there has been the same notation, but, unfortunately, a difference of pitch. English voices have been screwed up terribly high since the days of Handel, and the piano-makers are largely responsible for this wickedness. In America the continental pitch has at last been adopted by the majority of pianoforte-makers, and in England the reaction against the tyranny of the high pitch has set in. A pitch-pipe is a small thing, perhaps, with which to gauge the march of human brotherhood; but such a movement has its moral as well as its musical significance. If the angels have any ear for music, they will be glad in heart as well as in ear that the Christmas oratorios the world over will soon be sung to the same pitch.

A WRITER in the Presbyterian apparently takes it for granted that the minister of a generation ago did more work than the minister of to-day. Certainly, the old-time ministers were not idle; but, for the most part, they did not work at such a pace as the minister of to-day. Their industrious life was adjusted to the age of candlesticks and lamp-oil, not to that of the electric light or the locomotive. We do not mean that their work was relatively less valuable, but that it was far less multifarious and exhausting. The numerous societies which have sprung up in our churches, while they are a help to the minister, also make additional demands upon him. There is less change in the position of the country minister in the more remote rural districts than in that of the city minister. The movement of population has been away from the country to the city; and the increasing demands of metropolitan life upon the minister are more exhausting than ever, so that for the work of the modern ministry a good basis of physical health is one of the first requisites.

A VERY timely utterance, and all the more so because it was not brought out by the President's proclamation, is the article in the December number of the North American Review by Prof. N. S. Shaler on "The Last Gift of the Century." Prof. Shaler begins by pointing out the singularly favorable opportunity to those who would work for peace. He finds it in the "slow extinction of the ancient and therefore abiding prejudices which separate the races, the nations, the tongues, and the creeds, in the prepossessions and interests arising from the maintenance of military castes, and in the exceeding difficulty which has been encountered in forcing the public opinion of this time through the walls of tradition that encompass governments." To make use of this opportunity, Prof. Shaler advocates "a determined system of education which shall bring before the youth a true sense of the moral and economic abominations of war."

THIS education must begin at the bottom, in order to reach to the top. It is a pretty hard task to go to our legislatures and to Congress, and educate our representatives after we have chosen them. And yet a great deal of time must be spent in just this effort to educate our rulers in Congress unless we take sufficient pains to train them before we send them. Prof. Shaler says: "There can be no doubt that the time has come for the deliberate and systematic teaching of those truths which will serve to build in the minds of the people right notions as to the relation of violence to society. We have trusted too much to the secondary effects of advancing culture to keep down the old evil of militarism. We have relied on the absence of a great standing army and on the uses of peace to develop among our own citizens a horror of war; yet, with the shadow of the greatest conflict of modern days still upon us, we find the leading representatives of a great party, even men who have been exposed to all the cultivating influences which our country can afford, who know, or who have had every opportunity to comprehend, the misery which war entails, yet who are ever seeking to embroil their own nation with others. It needs but a glance at the records of the last Congress to show that our lawgivers lack all sense of what they are seeking, when they clamor for war as a means of vengeance or of national self-assertion. We need to breed up men who have a more civilized view of human relations."

WE hope the American Peace Society will take the opportunity, by public meetings and through circulation of its literature, to educate the people on peace principles. Our legislators, as well as the voters who choose them, need a good deal of education in this respect as in a good many others. The phrase "our national honor" is bandied about too freely, as if the only way to defend it was by force. This theory is derived from the code of the duellist, and ought not to command the respect and adhesion of those who have come to accept a more enlightened code for the settlement of disputes. We hear, also, of "national humiliation," as if a nation were to be humiliated by backing down from a position which it has discovered to be a wrong one. The humiliation may be apparent in the wrong step, but certainly not in acknowledging it. In this respect a nation ought to be as honorable and as courteous as an individual who confesses his mistake, and apologizes and makes reparation for it. A nation's code of ethics ought to represent the best element in its life, and not the worst.

THE Presbyterian is shocked to find Dr. George A. Gordon allowing that "the Christian thinker of to-day has the right to affirm, if he solemnly believes it, that all the divine punishments are chastisements, that God's final purpose in scourging his children is to bring them back to himself, and that even in hell the worm must gnaw and the fire burn in the service of eternal grace." The Presbyterian hopes better things, and protests against dropping the undying worm and the unquenchable fire out of the category of emblems of eternal punishment.

THE American people are reputed to have a sense of humor, and there is some foundation for the assumption. But it would seem as if all sense of the ridiculous had deserted a vast number of our people in the last week. To see the way in which newspapers and politicians have put on war-paint and feathers, one might suppose that we were getting up a grand national exhibition of "fantastics and horrors." Such displays ought to be confined to Fourth of July processions: they ought not to take place at the national capital, when there is serious business on hand. The American people, as seen in the newspapers, have presented a strange spectacle to foreign nations during the past week; and we advise our foreign friends not to take us too seriously. Already newspapers that sounded the war-cry at first are getting a little tired of their own music, and are beginning to ask who is responsible for having started the tune. By and by, when the chief agitators have had a chance to see themselves in the glass before they have washed off the war-paint, they may become keenly conscious that their position is somewhat grotesque.

THE WAR CLANG.

It is a sad jar in our ears at Christmas time, this discord of war harshly grating against the angel song of peace. We have become so used to Jingoism as an element in our political campaigns that we have had very little occasion to take it seriously. The talk of a more aggressive foreign policy is so childish that the majority of the people have not been deceived by it any more than by juvenile street parades or the bombast of a Fourth of July oration. To the credit of President Cleveland be it said that he has not been hitherto much affected by this war bluster. There have been those who have urged a more aggressive action toward Turkey, though it has not been clear to the President nor to many other citizens just how such action could be taken. But now it would seem as if the President by too much of this rant had been forced from the composure of his patriotism, and that he felt the necessity of paying more respect to the Jingo element than it deserves. It is greatly to be regretted that President Cleveland should have been deflected from his established course, and it is still more to be regretted that the Jingo element should have triumphed in both branches of Congress.

We are therefore compelled by the action of the President and Congress to take this war-cry much more seriously than we wish, because it is evident that those who are raising it are not taking it seriously enough. They have not in mind all the fearful consequences involved in a war between England and the United States, or they would not hang it upon such a slight pretext as a boundary dispute between England and Venezuela.

The Monroe doctrine has never been definitely formulated. It has been useful thus far in keeping us from entanglements in European affairs. America has been reproached more than once by the Saturday Review and other English papers for not taking some active part in the settlement of European questions. But we have not yielded to such solicitations. We have been willing to admit a larger share of interest and responsibility in foreign affairs on our own continent. But the Monroe doctrine, as is freely admitted by Secretary Olney, does not establish any general protectorate by the United States over other American States; and it does not relieve any American State from its obligations, nor prevent any European power directly interested from enforcing such obligations. He assumes that the Monroe doctrine has but a single purpose and object. It is that no European power or combination of European powers shall forcibly deprive an American State of the right and power of self-government, and of shaping for itself its own political fortunes and destinies. Without discussing the tenability of this definition of the Monroe doctrine, which seems a fair statement of what it meant or has come to mean to the American people, there are many who think that the present case does not come within its scope. On the contrary, it seems to them that, by his very definition of the Monroe doctrine, Secretary Olney has succeeded in excluding the Venezuela case in any aspect which the diplomatic correspondence has revealed. The United States has no general or direct protectorate over Venezuela, and cannot relieve that State from its just obligations, as fixed by international law. Nor is England engaged in an attempt to forcibly deprive that country of the right of exercising the power of self-government and of shaping its own political fortunes and destinies.

The most prominent case in which the United States has been called upon to assert the Monroe doctrine was in the invasion of Mexico by Louis Napoleon during our Civil War. This was a high-handed outrage against the republic of Mexico, and a blow directly aimed at the life of our own republic. If the Union had gone to pieces, Napoleon was ready to get some of the spoils. Mr. Seward's famous despatch, insisting on the withdrawal of French troops from Mexico, had the support of the whole people at a time when, at the close of the war, with an immense army, we were ready to maintain it. But, fortunately, the question was settled by diplomacy, not by war; and Napoleon did not represent the real feeling of France toward the United States, any more than President Cleveland now represents the real feeling of the United States toward England.

In the present issue there is nothing whatever similar to the French invasion. The title of England to Guiana is not disputed by the United States, any more than its title to Canada. It is merely a question of boundary between two territories, the validity of whose governments is not questioned. We pass no judgment upon the merits of the claim. Boundary lines often fray out into indefinable fringes, and encroachment may be easy on both sides for want of a perfect understanding as to where the boundary is; and, therefore, no subjects have been more fruitful of dispute between private estates and public domains than questions of boundary. But they are questions to be decided not by the knife and the revolver, as the miners formerly settled such disputes, but by courts of law in civilized communities and by courts of arbitration by civilized nations.

The United States, after marking out reservations for the Indians, has had more than it could do to keep its own citizens from trespassing upon them; and it has frequently been obliged to protect the South American republics against similar aggressions by American citizens, as in the case of the island of Alto Velo, which a number of Americans tried to wrest from St. Domingo. We do not assume that British subjects have been guilty of such aggressions in Venezuela. But, if they have been, the thing to do is to demonstrate the fact, and make an appeal to the conscience of the English people. Under this view, we do not condemn the proposition of the President to appoint a commission to examine the case and to report the facts. What we regret is the belligerent tone with which the President's message concluded.

We are far from excusing the English government from responsibility in declining to submit the whole question to arbitration. If it is confident of the strength of its position, it may as confidently submit it to arbitration. But we are not in a position to criticise England in this respect, for we have not responded to her appeal in regard to arbitration. The English Parliament passed a bill to arbitrate all matters of dispute between this country and the United States. But the proposition was not accepted by Congress, and nothing more has been done about it. If we wish, therefore, to develop the arbitration sentiment in England, we must begin by developing it in our own country. If the commission authorized by Congress is of any value, it will be in showing that here is a question that England and Venezuela may well submit to arbitration; and, should the question then arise whether the United States has any right to intervene in the matter, that, too, might be a legitimate subject to arbitration. If President Cleveland, after asking for such a commission, had prudently waited for its report on the facts without the bombastic threats which disfigure his message, he would have disarmed the Jingo and represented much better the real spirit of the American people.

War between England and America on such an issue would be a crime against humanity, and the American people do not want it and will not have it. This ought to be made very clear to the whole Jingo element in Congress, whose theatrical posing in this matter is as untimely as it is ridiculous.

RETROSPECT AND PROSPECT.

The close of another year is a suitable opportunity for reflection upon the purpose and aim of life. We cannot live on continuously and watch the years go by without putting to ourselves some serious questions as to what the old year bears away and what the new year brings with it. There is, or ought to be, for each of us, something that we fain would ring out, and a few things, nobler and better, that we desire to ring in. It is, whether we think it or not, a momentous thing to live in a world that is a passing show, "for man's illusion given." While it recedes and disappears, we hold on our way; and, as in setting out on a delightful journey we bid adieu to familiar and much loved sights, we also strain our eyes forward,—

"Bidding the lovely scenes at distance hail."

One of the most interesting incidents in the early life of Thomas Carlyle illustrates for us the attitude in which we all stand at the opening of a new year. He had a noble and devoted mother and a rugged and hard-headed father. The time had come when he was to leave the quiet hillside home at Ecclefechan, and enter the university at Edinburgh. His mother, tenderly solicitous of her boy to the last, rose early in the morning, that she might see him off and accompany him on the way. Having put in his bundle all that he required, the two set out together on foot; for there were no railroads in those days, and they were too poor to travel by coach. The anxious mother trudged along the rough mountain road with her son, and only at the end of the third mile did it occur to her that she would be required at home. Then they sat together on a heap of stones, such as one meets on the wild moors of Scotland, and had such communion as is only possible under like circumstances between mother and son. She fell on the young man's neck, and kissed him, and said: "God be with you, my lad, in the big city. Do not forget your prayers, and make a companion of your Bible." Having said this and wiped the tears from her eyes, she turned her face homeward; while her son fronted life with a brave heart, and went on alone to render a good account of himself at the university and to honor his mother's love.

Something like the same position comes to each of us at the parting of the years. Whether our friends be many or few, whether our circumstances be affluent or meagre, the necessity is upon us all of facing a new responsibility and of determining just what we shall do with it. It is cowardly to drift at such a moment, and heroic to drive; but, if we take the reins in our hands, it is well to determine beforehand what shall be our destiny. And so with every new year we draw our chart and map out our journey, and count the cost. We drop all superfluous baggage in the shape of idle regrets and futile repentances and besetting sins, and, bracing up for the journey on an untried way, trust in God and keep a stout heart. Who is there among us all that is not doing exactly this at the present moment? We hear the Christmas and New Year's bells as they ring from Tennyson's noble and heroic verse, and resolve that they shall bury our vices and greeds and lusts and enmities in a tumult of sound, and stir the better life within us by their hopeful and inspiring melodies. What if our lot is hard? We will at least try to mend it. What if our fortunes seem broken? There is within us the power to repair them. What if we have committed errors and mistakes? There is no reason why we should repeat them. What if the dreams of the past year have ended in a rude awakening? There are boundless resources of hope and enterprise still remaining. To indulge in fruitless remorse or morbid self-introspection at such a time is a disease. It is a sure sign of moral distemper and low fever, which we can only shake off by resolute will and invincible courage.

But, in facing the future, we are not justified in supposing that anything belongs to us by right which we ourselves do nothing to win. The way before us will not always run along the valleys or bend round the hills. It is generally like the roads made by the Romans. The conquering path is straight, no matter what is in the way. And, if there is a steep bit here and there, why it has to be scaled; and, if there is a river, it must be forded, and, if there is a bog, it has got to be drained. Difficulty to a true man is the spice of life. The captain of a ship is stimulated to increased watchfulness by the thought that a storm may overwhelm him, and that he holds in his hand other lives besides his own. The father of a family has a new motive for industry and thrift, for uprightness and pure living, when he knows that his indolence or dishonesty or immorality reacts not only upon him, but upon his innocent wife and children, and even upon those still unborn. The knowledge that our earthly work and progress may at any time be cut short without warning—a fact which comes home to us with added force at the close of every year, as we reflect upon many a vacant chair and desolate hearth—is no small incentive to resolute and sustained exertion. We live in a fool's paradise when we look into the future with a vacant, purposeless stare, and wait, like Micawber, for something to turn up. The necessity for enterprise, fortitude, effort, is always with us; but it seems to front us with added sternness on the 1st of January.

And so our word to everybody at the opening of the year—to the young and inexperienced, to the mature and discouraged, to individuals perplexed and sorely troubled, to struggling churches in suspense and anxiety—is this: There will be difficulties on your way, but keep a good heart and a stout resolve; and in all likelihood you will find a road through the difficulties, and not improbably the difficulties themselves will be the road.

MISPLACED CHIVALRY.

In the strange war-talk that has been raging over the land it is rather difficult to distinguish what motives are behind it. They seem to range all the way from a low, mercenary jealousy of English trade or a depraved desire to make partisan capital, and get an advantage for the next presidential election, up to an imaginary zeal for a great and social principle, and even a lofty, chivalric devotion to a supposed under-dog in the teeth of a mastiff. Seen in the dim distance, through the fogs of the Gulf of Mexico, it seems glorious to pledge the honor of the nation, and even to take deadly future risks for the sake of poor, little, oppressed Venezuela.

Let us grant that a real chivalry is the main factor, just now, in the hearts of editors and Congressmen; let us suppose that this is the noble sentiment that has stirred Mr. Cleveland, that inspires Mr. Olney's pen, that swells the soul of Senator Lodge, that is abroad over the country in this Christmas season; let us acknowledge that we all wish to do something handsome, humane, beneficent, for the weak and oppressed; yes, we wish to make sacrifices, and to take some heroic venture, so as to rebuke the greed and arrogance of wicked foreign powers. It may be safely assumed that the American people are a unit in this grand and generous purpose. Who that recalls the splendid heroism of our Mexican war, and our more recent benign conduct toward Chile, can doubt that all our traditions bind us over to the defence of the weak?

It happens, opportunely for us, that among other chances to win glory for ourselves there are now two fields specially open for our chivalrous undertaking. First, we have Venezuela on hand, with her terrible boundary dispute. But, though this dispute, it appears, is older than many of our voters, we have yet to hear of any great human suffering that has come from it. Who has lost a life over this dangerous fence in the wilderness of the Orinoco? It is true that the feelings of the Venezuelan government may have been hurt. Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Olney have suffered in their sympathies; but it is not yet clear that any person has lost his sleep for this hurt.

There is also a slight danger, in case we take up the wrongs of the Venezuelan government, that we may incidentally do injustice to some millions of innocent English people, many of whom we might have to shoot in the discharge of our quest. Is it not, therefore, quite possible, inasmuch as we cannot set the whole world right immediately, that we may at least lay our Venezuelan business on the table for a little while, and go in search of bigger game?

There is much bigger game waiting for our chivalry. To be sure, it is in Turkey; but Turkey is nearer to us to-day than Mexico was in Monroe's time. We could most of us draw a map of Turkey better than the map of the undisputed portion of Venezuela. How many Americans know what the capital of Venezuela is, or ever saw a native of that country? But we have considerable business interests with Turkey. Many Americans visit the shores of that land every year. Thousands of the subjects of Turkey are living in the United States. We owe the origin of our religion to a little Turkish province. The Armenians, cousins of ours in race and language, were among the first of the peoples of the world to embrace Christianity.

Meanwhile the civilized world has been aroused by the most frightful and wholesale oppression, devastation, and butchery, not only unchecked by the Turkish government, but abetted and encouraged from Constantinople. Hundreds of thousands of persons are now said to be starving and freezing. Hundreds of American citizens of the highest character, engaged in trade or in educational or missionary work, are threatened.

Here, then, if our nation wants a crusade worthy of its traditions, its humanity, and its civilization, is a field for our beneficent activity. There is nothing here on a small scale. The evil to be abated is big enough even for America. Is it not rather Quixotic to be galloping to the rescue of Venezuelan forest and swamps, when within actual touch of our own fingers we know that a whole race of men is being exterminated?

But what shall we do for Armenia? This is the difficult practical question in any case. It is very certain that we do not know what to do for Venezuela. It is not very likely, if we send an ex parte American commission, that we shall ever wisely find out. We might, however, try certain experiments. We will not insist that the President shall pour out the vials of his wrath upon the sultan. We will not say that Mr. Olney shall use his acumen to urge Lord Salisbury to take definite action becoming that Power which is specially responsible to-day for the maintenance of the Turkish barbarism at Constantinople. We will not demand that the white fleet shall sail for the Bosphorus. We will only suggest, in the first instance, a slight labor test for the trial of our chivalric feeling.

If Miss Barton and the Red Cross are going on their beneficent, life-saving errand this winter, let us see how many of our Venezuelan philanthropists will give her the moiety of money—the half the cost of a gun-boat—that she needs for the starving and oppressed Armenians. Let us boil down some of our affluent, popular enthusiasm into the form of a little hard cash.

BEGINNING WITH THE CHILDREN.

At a time when the Christian world is turning with one accord to the little child who, nearly two thousand years ago, came into the home of the Nazareth carpenter, it is appropriate to consider the relations of childhood to citizenship.

Scientists, physiological and psychological, show the value of the early formative years; yet the community is slow to heed them. Primary school teachers are frequently the youngest, most inexperienced and ill-paid of any in the list. Outside the school-room the little ones are allowed to play on the street, picking up all sorts of acquaintances, and forming bad habits of mind and body at a susceptible period, when it is important to acquire habits that will foster good character through life. If one wants proof of the inconceivable importance of good early training, he has only to turn to the records of the San Francisco kindergartens. Of nine thousand children who during the past few years have passed through those kindergartens connected with the public schools, children from the homes of the so-called "common people," not one has ever since been arrested for crime. Here, surely, is a strong proof that prevention is far better than cure.

Judicious care of children includes not only wise ways of dealing with them so as to prevent crime, but it must also consider how best to meet every stage of delinquency from the moment of suspicion up to the time when permanent reform may be assumed. There is a vast difference in the way these questions are met in the forty-four States of this union. It is not enough to be born in the United States: one may well be grateful for being born in one State rather than another. Some of the Western States, like Michigan and Minnesota, have made special studies of child-life, and have many excellent features in their laws in reference to children. In the East perhaps no one State has more active workers in behalf of the young than Massachusetts.

A manual, prepared by Miss Emily Greene Balch, for the use of those who have to deal with juvenile offenders, shows how humane, wise, and far-reaching are the arrangements for the treatment of boys and girls who have transgressed the laws. This manual of nearly fifty pages, with copious footnotes, citations of statutes, regulations and decisions, covers almost every question that might arise in dealing with these juvenile delinquents. In reading these lucid pages, we see at once what a vast amount of adult crime might be avoided if the provisions here so clearly set forth were uniform in all the States of the land.

But, running parallel with this after care or, better yet, preceding it, should be the education that prevents juvenile crime,—the kindergarten, the sloyd school, the vacation school, and the wise and tender home influence,—in some home, even if not the home into which the child is born. Who can tell how much of the character of the little Nazarene boy was evolved by learning to work with his hands at his father's bench, with the gentle, loving, peasant mother refining all by her presence?

The home influence in strengthening and purifying character, in teaching generosity and self-sacrifice, cannot be overestimated. It is precisely this influence, which any honest home must exert, which makes it so much better for a child than an institution.

In this respect, again, the States that are doing most in the way of child-saving lead. They are doing away with institutions for children and finding instead homes,—not mere abodes into which children may be thrust and left to such fate as may befall them, but homes that shall be searched out, inspected, and composed of such parents as shall gladly welcome the co-operation of visitors under whose continued oversight the boys and girls shall be placed, the visitors acting not as spies, but as counsellors and friends to foster parents as well as to the wards under their care.

Massachusetts has been a leader in this work, through the praiseworthy efforts of the State Board of Lunacy and Charity. Hundreds of children have reason to bless their work. But, now that the children under their supervision are counted by thousands, it seems only wise that, as the department of health was severed from the State Board, so now the children should be put under a special bureau. As one reads the report of the State Board of Health of Massachusetts, it is seen how absolutely impossible would it have been for the State Board of Lunacy and Charity to have carried on such stupendous undertakings. So, after ten years of the work of the Children's Bureau, it will seem strange that this work was not sooner transferred to a separate bureau.

A children's bureau should not only look after the class of children whose young lives come close to crime, but it should so look after the smallest details of the training and education of the children coming under its influence that they shall be headed in the right direction from the very start. We can make good citizens only by beginning with the children.

Brevities.

A Happy New Year to all our readers!

Dr. Miles, being dead, yet speaks to us on his beloved theme, in the article entitled "A Name above Every Name."

The University of Chicago is to be congratulated on Miss Culver's gift of a million dollars, and on Mr. J. D. Rockefeller's ability and willingness to double that gift for scientific work.

We commend Dr. F. G. Peabody's thoughtful address, which we give on another page, to those who have forgotten the well-forged links that the years have wrought between the patriotism of the forefathers and that of our own day.

An exchange calls attention to the fact that two Jews of Bagdad have bought all that remains of Babylon. This strange reversal of fate has been illustrated many times in this country, where the descendants of slaves own the soil on which their fathers were captives.

We extend the hand of fellowship to a new Baptist paper, the Commonwealth, which just on the eve of Christmas has its advent among our exchanges. It is to be published weekly in Philadelphia; and the editor is Rev. J. S. James, D.D. We wish for it calm waters and smooth sailing.

Booker Washington is a man who may well be quoted. Here is one of his latest utterances: "I am not ashamed to confess to you that I have the greatest sympathy with the South. I have grown to the point where I can love a Southern white man as much as a Northern white man. To me 'a man's a man for a' that.' As a race, I believe that we strengthen ourselves at every point by extending this sympathy; for no race can cherish ill-will and hatred toward another race without its losing in all of those elements that tend to create and perpetuate a strong and healthy manhood. I propose that no man shall drag me down by making me hate him."

Pro and Con.

HYMNS FOR CHILDREN.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Permit me to call attention to the little Book of Hymns for Children, written many years ago by Mrs. Mary Eliot Parkman, and now, in answer to many requests, reprinted and for sale at W. B. Clarke's bookstore, for the price of 40 cents. These hymns are already very familiar in many homes, and about many firesides children have repeated such lines as—

"God cares for every little child
That on this large earth liveth;
He gives them home and food and clothes;
And more than these God giveth."

The present reprint will be welcomed by many parents for the sake of their little children. The hymns have a gentle, motherly sweetness and simplicity; and some of them remind one in their unhesitating, direct movement of the early Christmas carols.

The last hymn is, for persons of all ages, one of the most perfect of our evening prayers:—

"Another day is numbered with the past,
Another night is given us for rest.
Father, my spirit at thy feet I cast:
Oh! gather it unto thy loving breast."

"Look on its failures, efforts, and mistakes,
Look on its inward stubborn roots of sin,
See how the law that it accepts it breaks:
Lord, to thy secret presence take it in."

"Bless those that love me, those that love me not,
Strengthen the feeble and uplift the grieving,
Send to thy children, in whatever lot,
Riches and peace and strength in true believing."

"So to thy arms my body I commit,
My weary body to thine arms outspread:
Prepare me to accomplish what is fit,
And peace and pureness watch beside my bed." F. G. P.

THE NORWEGIAN SYSTEM.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I have carefully read the Washington address of Rev. David N. Beach printed in the Register of November 14. I still fail to see the value of his logic or the force of his argument. There is certainly a "hole in the tub" touching the real practical merits of the so-called new improvement of the Norwegian principle.

The haters of the drink traffic, the total abstiners, are virtually asked to haul down their flag, so to speak, in all large New England towns. It is assumed that in certain cities of Massachusetts the battle for no-license is manifestly and totally futile.

Even were the churches of a given municipality all enlisted for the fight, even with honorable men and women not a few who never bow the knee to the rum Baal, this cause for the time being must be abandoned, in order to try the experiment of a kind of whitewashed saloon. A business intrinsically lawless and disreputable can, forsooth, be baptized, born anew, regenerated. Think, for a moment, of the paternalism involved in this new Cambridge notion. The salaried, total-abstinence bar-tenders are to have glasses that are similar to the scale-marked vessels of our apothecaries. The drinking public of New England are to be served much as the nurse feeds cracker and milk to infants. Imagine the horny-handed workman taking his straight drink according to this temperance standard! Is it not a ridiculous posing all round?

Again, were our virtuous Christian stockholders in these new liquor companies to part with some of their five per cent. shares to more easy-going temperance reformers, the suit were lost! This new shape of paternalism assuredly presents "holes," even a very skimmerful!

What, now, is the better form of the Norwegian system? In the matter of no-license to tippling-shops, our motto may well continue to all time:—

"Wrestle and fight and pray,
The conflict ne'er give o'er;
Renew it boldly every day,
And help divine implore."

Let us agree to a form of very carefully restricted low license to wholesale dealers and family grocers, but never any permit to saloons, even to benevolent corporation bars!

Where the no-license cause is once won, let companies be organized and incorporated to open coffee-houses, Holly-tree Inns, reading-rooms, etc., with all kinds of hot and cold temperance drinks. Let these places be more or less luxurious according to the immediate locality. This is, indeed, the more excellent way. In time, perhaps, even Boston will grow to the experiment of the correct Norwegian plan.

WILLIAM H. SAVARY.

Jamaica Plain.

For the Christian Register.

GOOD-BY, OLD YEAR, GOOD-BY!

BY REV. WILLIAM BRUNTON.

Good-by, old year, thy days are done,
Thy record endeth here:
Thy battle fought, the victory won,
Thy name is hero dear.
But all thy race, like human kind,
Have little while to live:
They pass like music on the wind,
So sweet and fugitive!

Good-by, old year, our hearts retain Thy pictures painted clear,—
The spring's surprise, the summer's plain,
Fair fall, and winter drear.
Each season gave us joy profound,
As Nature loves to give,
Then in our hearts the beauty bound,
That else were fugitive!

Good-by, old year, the new will come,
And wear thy graces well;
And thus we see the added sum,
The space wherein we dwell.
But as for time, 'e'en so for man,
Through change he still must live,
And read creation's wondrous plan
In moments fugitive!

Good-by, old year, this is the word
Retold again, again:
Our souls the inspiration heard,
And said a sweet Amen!
We are the better for the years,
For joy and grief they give,
For hopes and fears, for smiles and tears,
In time so fugitive!

A NAME ABOVE EVERY NAME.

BY HENRY A. MILES.

It is noteworthy that after nearly two thousand years of controversy the most descriptive name of him here referred to was given by the first Christian writer,—first in time as well as ability. He had broad views. He appears to have cast his eye over the course of history. He went back to the creation; and, as he saw in the first Adam the progenitor of human beings, so he saw in the second Adam the progenitor of a renewed spiritual race.

And what does he say? If he had thought of anything more important to affirm, he probably would have stated that. The needs of the times, the need of his own perilous condition, the needs of his hopes for the success of his cause, required the most distinctive title he could announce. He defines Jesus to be "a quickening spirit,"—not a philosopher, not an orator, not a reasoner, not a discoverer of new truths, not the inventor of new arts, not a warrior, not a conqueror, not the head of an ecclesiastical hierarchy.

Because he was not an example of any of these types of distinction, we are apt to underrate the greatness that was his. A few poor parallels may show what that greatness was. The triteness of the illustrations may be pardoned if they reflect some little light on a world-wide agency.

There comes into your town a man who has brought a new life there. He has broken the ice which had frozen everything. He has awakened fresh social sympathies, led many unconsciously to catch his tastes, aims, and habits; and, while hearts have been drawn to him, they have been drawn to one another. In time he has lifted up your whole neighborhood. You find the springs of its progress all centering in him.

Who is he that has done this? He has not the wealth, the social position, the learning, the eloquence, which others possess. He makes no noise in the world, aims at no immediate startling effects, follows his course in a self-restrained way; but, somehow, an influence goes out from him, beginning at first with his nearest associates, working silently to outer circles, until he becomes the magnet of his little world. What is it that achieves this?

The sources of personal influence are often obscure. No two writers would agree in describing them. But beyond all analysis and argument one fact is clear,—the man referred to has been "a quickening spirit." These are very simple words; but they have a deep meaning, and fully account for what he has done.

An inspiring power is seen in another case. The school-teacher who is most successful does not necessarily have the profoundest knowledge, does not show the greatest number of diplomas, does not rule his classes with the exactness of a military drill, does not attract the widest outside attention. It is the instructor of whom it may be said that his kingdom is in the hearts of his pupils.

You would smile at one who should ascribe his influence to any external cause,—such as bodily size and strength, or descent in an eminent pedigree, or to the name of the school, or the plan of the school-house, or the peculiar methods he employs, or any supposed fabulous arts. We must go back of all these. We find the explanation only when we recognize a power to awaken ambition, to elevate aspirations, to give life and earnestness to all the processes of learning. Do we not find the summit of success where there is "a quickening spirit"?

Then, again, look to the mother in her household. Perhaps it seems strange that she should have such a formative influence. She has no outward constraint like that of the father of the family, he peremptory and she gentle, he hurrying and she quiet, he anxious to have certain ends accomplished, and she more thoughtful of the temper in which they should be undertaken, he filling his home with anxious cares, and she diffusing a serene atmosphere in every room and in every heart.

Which does the most for the souls of the home circle? Whose spirit best wins affection? To whom do children most freely repair for sympathy and counsel? Whom are they most careful not to displease? Whose image stands before them as the guiding star of their life, and is remembered with undying love?

We all know the answer to these questions. It is the parent—usually the mother, though not always so—who is the "quickeningspirit." If we think that he to whom these words were first applied had a large endowment of feminine qualities, this is not disproved by his knowledge of the deep springs of action in our nature and his sublime trust in them.

Another illustration in a lowly sphere may be briefly added. During the War of the Rebellion large hospitals were erected in Washington for the badly wounded, and hundreds of our soldiers were for months under medical care. Among the nurses was one woman whom none of the sufferers ever forgot.

It was no charm of youth, no personal beauty, no rich attire, no rare science or skill, that gave her pre-eminence. Her singular influence, some might say, might have been in part explained if she had been connected with persons in power. But no one knew who she was. Nurses came from different Northern States; and she went unheralded and unknown,—one among a hundred. She may have been born in a stable, and had not where to lay her head.

But she had not long been there before her superior influence was felt. It was not so much what she said and did as her supreme power to touch human hearts. There was something radiating from her looks, from the tone of her voice, the outpouring of her soul, which won the love of every one there. The convalescent drew health from her presence. The dying fixed on her their closing eye. She became the angel of the hospital, the Messiah of that little world.

These are very unworthy illustrations. And yet we may see that, while the influence of the good man who comes into your town ceases to a considerable extent, though not wholly, with the generation in which he lives, and the teacher's uplifting power rarely extends beyond his school, and the mother's formative care is confined chiefly to her family, and the angel of the hospital was little known beyond its wards, One there was whose field was the world. But all worked on essentially the same principles, and with a proof of like success. His name is above every name.

In comparison with the grandeur of his aim, how evanescent the power of Alexander and Napoleon! while all our controversies about orthodoxy or heterodoxy seem puerile.

ENVOI.

I walked with poets in my youth,
Because the world they drew
Was beautiful and glorious
Beyond the world I knew.

The poets are my comrades still,
But dearer than in youth;
For now I know that they alone
Picture the world of truth.

—William Roscoe Thayer.

A HIMALAYAN SETTLEMENT.

BY P. C. MOZOOMDAR.

The English have a wonderful gift of founding cities in wild places. During the last century, at least one hundred old towns have been made new, and many new towns have been created in unlikely places. They have interspersed the Himalayan Mountains, for a length of about seventeen hundred miles, with settlements and sanitariums at various distances from each other. Each great province has its hill station, where the military and civic chiefs retire during the heat of the summer months with their families and followers. Bengal has its Darjeeling, the north-western provinces have Masuri and Naini Tal, which last, high as it is, has a beautiful mountain lake of about a mile long. Punjab has Murree and Simla. Besides, Bombay and Madras have their respective hill stations on other mountains. The queen of these hill sanitariums is Simla. This is the summer retreat of the governor-general of all India, the commander-in-chief of her Majesty's Indian forces, the lieutenant governor of the Panjab, with their secretaries and official establishments, extensive premises having been built for their residences and offices. Besides, many Europeans and Indian princes have their private houses. The Brahmo-Somaj has built here a place of worship, and also a hermitage, or Asram, in a romantic spot, where I am allowed to dwell.

Simla is noted not for its political importance only, but also for its climate, its scenery, and for its surroundings. Its lowest point is fully seven thousand feet above the level of the sea. It commands a fine view of the everlasting snows, with celebrated sanctuaries spoken of in the Hindu book of ancient and legendary fame. Kailasa, the abode of Siva and Parvati, his mountain bride, is not more than a fortnight's march in the interior; and, though you cannot climb the heavenly height, it is said that you can hear the sacred bells jangling day and night. And, if you knew where to take your stand at Simla, you could get glimpses of the far-off plains of the Panjab, through which the lordly Sutlej winds its course, like a chain of silver. About eight or nine hours' jolting climb in a wofully constructed hill-carriage, called the tonga, drawn by a pair of half-tamed country horses, which kick and bite whenever they get an opportunity, you reach Simla from the foot of the hills, which foot itself is over two thousand feet above the level of the sea. The tonga is a vehicle made to accommodate four persons, two before and two behind, with a canvas hood on the top. It is mounted on two sturdy wheels which rattle and creak and bump, and throw up as much dust and mud as they can. The road to Simla is full fifty-eight miles, and on account of heavy traffic is loaded with tons of white dust that burns in your eyes and chokes your ears and nostrils, as you make the weary ascent. The heat and glare are great. On the right and left are great mountains crowding above each other, right away as far as you can see,—gaunt and tawny, and almost destitute of vegetation in summer time. But, as you roll upward, the atmosphere grows clearer and cooler, and at last cold, till you have to cast about for a warm coat amid your luggage, which is crammed into every corner of the ill-shaped tonga.

But, after your troublesome ride, as you approach Simla, the scene wonderfully changes. Springs trickle down the hillsides, streamlets glimmer in the distance; trees and creepers and shrubs, one after another, start before your eyes, later on spread in patches, then grow continuous, differing from the vegetation you so well know in the plains. They grow dense and green, the dust affects them not, till the Himalayan pine makes its appearance in thousands. These are light, long-leaved pines, locally called cheer, giving out a thick gum, which smells of turpentine, and cones that are not conical at all, but straight and scaly like ant-eaters' tails. These mountain trees grow so thick that sometimes two thousand of them are known to be cut down on one piece of ground which did not exceed two hundred yards square. In and about Simla this long-leaved pine is as abundant as forests of gloomy, conical fir that rear themselves, like giant temples, sometimes as high as sixty or seventy feet, on the hillsides and on the summits. Their giant arms are grizzily with masses of thin, bristling foliage, on which the pretty cones stand perpendicularly and spread their aroma. Forests of rhododendron also appear, shading the darkness of the fir with a milder hue, and blazing with glorious clusters of pink bloom in March and April. Every slope is green, every hill-top is crowned with its wood, every gorge has its little stream; and the valleys below are terraced and carpeted with crops of many colors, with here and there the picturesque huts of the peasants. The white hedge roses hang in silky clusters, spreading the delicate perfume in the crisp, transparent air. The endless mountains rise and rise till they are lost in dreamy haze. The whole place is lighted and shadowed with a strange brilliance and softness when the sun shines. The rareness of the atmosphere gives increased lustre to the evening star and deeper blue to the sky. The nights are still and glorious. The temperature varies from twenty-three degrees in winter sometimes to eighty degrees in summer. The frosts begin in November, the snow-storms blow in January, the monsoon rains descend in July and August; but in the spring and autumn months the climate of Simla is fit for the abode of the Olympian gods. There are colonies of monkeys, red-faced and black-faced. The fat, furry, bushy-tailed flying-squirrel sometimes visits you of a night, and, if you try to catch him, as I did, gives you a bite which makes the blood flow copiously. I imprisoned him in a stout box, but found in the morning he had escaped, cutting a clean hole in the bottom. The birds are many, small, and richly feathered, having each a little song that resounds in the woods; but they are shy, for fear of the Englishman's gun. You seldom see them, but hear them almost all day.

Simla, being in the centre of a large number of hill principalities, all of them Hindu, and not Turanian or Buddhist, as is the case in Darjeeling, has an almost exclusive Hindu population. The town itself, where more than thirty thousand people live during the season,—that is, from April to November,—is nondescript, as all towns are where Europeans settle in large numbers, because they are followed by their Mohammedan servants and clerks; and coolies and camel-drivers and muleteers and syces, of all nationalities, flock in. What I mean is that the original inhabitants in hill states and suburban villages are all Hindus, finely made Rajputs, fair-complexioned, tall, slim, with dark eyes, Roman noses, and well-cut mouths. Some of the common female laborers are remarkably handsome. They are exceedingly poor and simple, but in holiday times put on much finery in the shape of gaudy red or blue blouses and chadars, flowered calico trousers, immense nose-rings, ear-rings, ankle-rings, toe-rings, and chains of all sorts for the neck and waist. There are annually two fairs,—one in a valley called Sipi, and the other on a summit called Tara Devika Tibba. All Simla, official and Indian, flocks to the former; and even the viceroy is there with his staff. The picturesque hill people gather under their Raja; and there is buying and selling and chaffing and dancing, but absolutely no drinking, except on the part of the Europeans and their camp-followers. There is a wonderful difference between the hillmen in the town of Simla and those in the outskirts. The townsmen, who mostly come to sell milk, butter, and fruits, are as astute, money-loving, and unmindful of truth as possible; while out in the villages every one who goes there is charmed with the simplicity, contentedness, honesty, and goodness of the natives. Here is a living instance of how civilization in some cases spoils without improving either the body or mind.

The natural advantages of Simla as a health resort were found out a long time ago, when it was an obscure village, under a petty hill chief, about the year 1817. The British had a cantonment not far from there; and the officers, in the abundance of their leisure, often came to Simla for the purpose of wandering about, and shooting any game they might find. The place thus gradually got known, houses were built here and there, the abundant timber growing on the hills supplied ready materials. The great pines and oaks had only to be cut down and squared to be made into beautiful residences. The first house built is said to have been by Capt. Kennedy, who was a political agent of the British in the neighborhood. English invalids flocked in from all parts of the country: a viceroy occasionally came up from Calcutta. In 1830 Lord William Bentinck sent instructions for a house to be built for him at Simla; and from that time it became a place of fashion for Englishmen, especially the military. In 1864 Lord Lawrence, "the Lion of the Panjab," who had been given the viceroyalty, made it a condition of his acceptance of this office to be allowed to come up to Simla every year, with his council and all the secretariat offices. Since then every viceroy has been coming up and staying here for six months, so that Simla has grown to be a second metropolis. It is crowded with European pleasure-seekers of both sexes, who cannot number less than three thousand. They fill the place with the din and clash of their amusements: they perpetually gallop over the mountain paths with their dogs behind them. They roll about in jinrickshas, with which the coolies rush at a mad speed. They have big dinners and dances almost every night, keeping late hours. They have established hotels and clubs and liquor-shops. They kill sheep and cattle by hundreds. Some people say, when the English leave India, the mementos of their rule preserved on the Himalayas will be shin-bones, empty beer-bottles, and stumps of cigars. Indeed, this madness of incessant pleasure-seeking jars on the soul of the quiet Hindu, whose forefathers sought these solitudes for worship and meditation. But there is a seamy side of everything; and who but the English could have made this distant hill settlement what it is?

The Brahmo-Somaj has taken two or three acres of land on one of the quietest and woodiest hillsides. There a Mandir has been built with contributions from many, some of the contributors being Indian chiefs and princes. The hermitage is a modest little abode; and both these premises are as far from the noise of the bazaar and the clatter of hoofs and wheels as one might wish. The place was consecrated nearly ten years ago, and since then I have sometimes been here to spend months both for my own spiritual advantage and the benefit of the local public. Here the relations between the Indian and English communities are less strained; and at public meetings held by the Brahmo-Somaj not only our own people, but English officials of high rank, are generally present. Of late, however, there has been a good deal of falling off in pleasant relations between the two communities. No cause is apparent on the surface, but underneath there is much mutual jealousy. This is a subject which I would not just now touch. Let my general description of Simla suffice for the present.

HOLLAND AND ITS PEOPLE.

BY REV. HENRY G. SPAULDING.

It might be well were nations to die early, like those whom the gods are said to love. For countries, as for men, survival after grand achievements is often but a shadowy existence. In comparison with a glorious past, "this present of theirs" is like "moonlight unto sunlight," or "as water unto wine." There is hope for a nation only when the past lives on in the present, when memories become inspirations, and pride in heroic ancestors is a spur to new heroism. Such thoughts have been suggested by a recent sojourn in Holland. The country is so small that tourists usually "take a run" through its chief cities, glance at the pictures in its galleries, and catch passing glimpses of its windmills and canals. But Holland has rich rewards for those who linger in its famous historic towns, and penetrate some of its less frequented provinces. The first and most enduring impression which the traveller receives is that of the fight which man has waged here with nature. For it is literally true that "the Dutch have taken Holland." They have lifted it out of seas and lakes, and made these into dry land. It cannot be said in the Netherlands that "God made the country, while man made the town"; for here cities and plains are alike the creation of human genius and human energy. These innumerable canals are the arms of a Briareus who has risen dripping from the ocean, and stretches forth his hands to grasp the commerce of the world. These windmills at every turn are so many flag-staffs bearing the banners of a people who have transformed bogs and marshes into fertile polders and blooming gardens. And to-day, as in the times when the Dutch were founding their colonies in far-off lands, and whitening every sea with their sails, the waterways of Rotterdam and Amsterdam groan under the burden of heavy-laden ships, and their warehouses are filled with the products of every clime. But all the time one hears through this march-music of a nation's industry and commerce the leit-motif of a grand and triumphant past. We can never forget the great admirals and commanders who raised Holland to this pinnacle of success. Their sea-fights with the navies of older countries opened the way for these substantial victories of peace. The "Admirals' Room" in the magnificent Ryks Museum at Amsterdam, with its portraits of heroes and paintings of ocean warfare, is but a single pictured page out of the history of the Netherlands. The bravery and strategy of hundreds of officers, through long years of conflict, made possible the Holland of to-day. And to their achievements must be added the splendid courage and heroic fidelity of leaders and people through the ever memorable struggle with Spain, which throw such a glamour over the rise of the Dutch Republic. All this brilliant past of Holland lives on, not alone in the memory, but in the imagination and the feelings of the people. In painted canvas and on sculptured stone the story is ever present before the eye. Each town has its historic monuments, and feasts and spectacular processions commemorative of the ancient days are of frequent occurrence. Most of all is this pressure of antiquity felt in the reverence which is paid to these warrior princes and kings, who wrought the deeds that give to men an immortality of fame. The founder of Dutch liberty, William of Orange, seems almost a living presence; and the young Wilhelmina has the love of a people who see in their girl queen something more than a royal figure-head on the Ship of State. She is to them the last link in the shining chain of the Nassau-Orange line. In her person the real royalty of the kings and princes of this famous house is recognized and felt.

But Holland has had other rulers than her kings. In three of the most interesting cities of the Netherlands the foreign visitor realizes in a special degree the subtle influence which the Dutch intellect and imagination have exerted upon the thought and art of the modern world. In the Ryks Museum at Amsterdam we are under the spell of the artistic genius of Rembrandt and his great contemporaries among the Dutch painters. From the walls of the venerable Hall of the Senate, in the University at Leyden, four centuries of science and learning look down upon us as we gaze upon the portraits of such thinkers as Grotius, Scaliger, Arminius, and Kuenen; while at The Hague we uncover the head at the tomb of Spinoza, the father of modern philosophy. The painters, however, will be the most lovingly remembered. For here in Holland was an art which glorified the human and the natural, finding in man and in the common incidents of his daily life unfailing sources of inspiration. Some of this Dutch art, it must be acknowledged, is of the earth, earthy. It delights in depicting the pleasures of conviviality. Jan Steen and Adrian van Ostade show us many a boisterous drinking-bout, and paint with equal skill a tavern brawl or a peasants' merrymaking. Pieter de Hooch and Gerard Douw, besides the charming effects of light in their interiors, give us at times a foretaste of the unedifying realism of much of our modern fiction. But Dutch genre painting rises, also, to the height of the fiction of Balzac and Thackeray in representing the actual comedies of life; while Frans Hals and Rembrandt give us color-portraits that are as ideally truthful as the characters of Shakspeare. Indeed, we best describe Rembrandt when we call him the Shakspeare of Holland, who used the brush as England's great dramatist used the pen. The witchery of his color is comparable only to that of the style-color in Shakspeare's richest verse. Both of these men knew life in its infinite variety, and, with the power which a sane genius wields, gave the world undying pictures of "the human heart by which we live." Rembrandt is not usually classed among the great religious painters. But, in addition to the exquisite painting of the child Jesus in old Simeon's arms and the wonderful etchings of "The Healing of the Sick" and "The Descent from the Cross," he has left other etchings, less widely known, in which scenes from the gospel history are treated with a quiet and reverent naturalism which is far more effective than the "Nativities," "Ecce Homos," and "Crucifixions" that "cry aloud" from so many grandiose canvases in the European galleries. A few of these rare etchings, which are carefully guarded in the library of the Amsterdam Museum, are worth a trip to Europe to see.

So pervasive is this influence of art and history that it requires an effort to shake it off sufficiently to study the Holland of to-day. To make such a study with any approach to thoroughness, one must of course make a lengthened stay in the country, and have a good command of the language. But even the transient visitor learns that the Dutch have practically the same problems of thought and life to solve that are perplexing the wise and humane of every land. In their Parliament parties divide on the burning question of religious education in the schools. In the large cities, and equally in many of the rural districts, poverty and pauperism are the "ghosts that will not down." Directors of Associated Charities and kind-hearted burgomasters are often staggered and baffled in their efforts to help those who seemingly cannot help themselves. In sparsely settled hamlets one finds in the thatched cottage the same overcrowding of a large family in a single living-room which is the scandal of our city tenement houses. The drink curse also presses heavily on the people of Holland, in spite of brave efforts for the temperance reform. It is curious to note how the natural conservatism of the Dutch mind makes of Socialism an interesting stranger rather than a near acquaintance. Yet even in the land of windmills signs are not wanting that new tests are to be applied to the way in which men can best live together in the social body. In the province of Gelderland a Social-Democratic Bunte has been carrying on what has so far proved to be a successful experiment in this direction. This community was formed only a year ago; but already it has established various industries and manufactures, and finds a field for the employment of talents of different orders, from chemists and teachers to field-hands and dairy-maids. As practical business men are at the head of the Bunte, it is not likely to be a second Brook Farm; but the fact of its existence, the enthusiastic loyalty of its members, and the opinion one hears so often expressed in Holland that something must be done to bring in the better day are as important to be noted as the older and not yet settled disputes of theological factions among the Dutch. The land of Arminius and Gomar is still the field of contending sects, who set up their opposing standards even in the poorest and most thinly settled regions of the country. The liberal thinker cannot help crying out, "A plague on both your houses!" Nor can he fail to regret that the land which honors the genius of Kuenen as among the brightest stars in its national constellation exhibits so little of the sweetness and light of a rational Christianity. Among thinking men, and especially with the students of theology in the Leyden University, the influence of Kuenen's views is strongly felt; and it may be that the country of Spinoza and Kuenen will yet have its Channing and its Martineau.

NEW YORK LETTER.

It is to be deplored that the beauty and gayety of the holiday season has been marred by the present grave national issues and by the local disasters which have crowded fast upon each other in Wall Street. What should be the gladdest and merriest time of all the year has received a tinge of sadness. Not a newspaper seems to have its usual space for the time-honored Christmas and New Year congratulations and hopeful prophecies. There is but one topic—the Venezuelan question—with editors, clergymen, citizens, at the clubs, and at formal public dinners. Even the members of the New York "Society of Pilgrim Mothers" at its annual feast this week took pains to state their views of the trouble, and how it could be settled. Silence from every one who is not an authority on the history and causes of the dispute would materially help the situation, but it is the one small virtue no one here seems to possess. It is as if one and all were trying to obey the last clause of the injunction of the Irish judge who said to an attorney in his tribunal, "All the court wants out of you is silence, and as little of that as possible."

Happily for two institutions, the Hebrew Technical Institute and the Educational Alliance, the Hebrew Fair held for their benefit during the last two weeks at the Madison Square Garden was an assured financial, as well as social success, before these troublous times began. Stupendous energy on the part of the projectors of the undertaking and skilful management have resulted in the fair netting over $150,000. This very handsome sum signifies that the Hebrews in New York have been generous patrons of the fair, and that they are earnest believers in the charitable work to which their money is to go. And, in truth, there are no better managed institutions, nor any exerting a more helpful influence than the two which the Hebrews have established and maintain for educating the poor of their own faith. The Educational Alliance, which occupies a handsome building on lower East Broadway, was suggested to the Jews of New York, as the People's Palace in London was to its projectors, by Walter Besant's well-known novel, "All Sorts and Conditions of Men." The men and women who seek the benefits of the Alliance may enjoy in one week thirty-six forms of activities, and the officers state that the average daily attendance in all the classes is four thousand one hundred and seventy four. The Hebrew Technical Institute was organized for the purpose of offering free to the sons of Jewish parents a general education, combined with such training in the mechanical arts as will fit them to gain for themselves a comfortable support.

With the possible exception of the Chamber of Commerce, which is famous for the important part its members take in matters of public interest, there is no place in the city where more conferences concerning the public good are held or where more valuable work is done than at the United Charities Building. Innumerable schemes for the amelioration of the condition of the poor or for some form of social betterment receive here a careful and intelligent consideration. Often the subjects discussed are only indirectly germane to the special work of any one of the associations occupying the building. Such was the case the other day, when a conference was held "On the Causes of Agricultural Depression throughout the State." The subject incidentally presented itself for discussion to the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, after an ineffectual attempt had been made by its officers to find work in the country for a great surplus of men who could get nothing to do in the city. Why this stagnation in the country and over-population in the city? Why deserted farms everywhere and ruined farmers on all sides? asked these keen-sighted investigators. Their answer was given at the conference above mentioned. It is worthy of wide publicity, and should be carefully considered by those who are on farms and want to get off them and those whose dream it is to retire to a farm for the sake of a living and liberty. The conclusion arrived at by the specialists whose testimony was given at the meeting is that shallow brains are responsible for the trouble. Actual ignorance on the part of the farmers of all agricultural science is the chief cause. Were there no sterile brains among them, there would be much less agricultural depression. It was found that, while there is an actual deterioration of soil through the State, and that this is one of the causes that impel people to the city to seek their fortunes, there is a large amount of fertility left; and scientific knowledge is alone needed to unlock the treasure. The soil could be restored, and more than restored, to its original productive condition if the tillers of it would use the rich fertilizing material at hand which is now allowed to go to waste. If the farmers would inform themselves of the results obtained at the experiment stations, if they would send their boys to be trained at agricultural colleges, and if the colleges would in turn send out teachers in the natural sciences, organize farmers' institutes, and impart a knowledge of modern methods of restoring the land to its original productiveness, a better state of affairs in the country would soon set in.

It is well to note in connection with this subject the success that has attended the experiment made by the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor in the cultivation of vacant city lots by the unemployed. A practical and scientific farmer has supervised the work, and many a hungry man and woman has found lucrative, healthy employment. Tools and seeds were supplied the applicants, and the crops that they raised were theirs to sell or use as they pleased. A woman has proved herself the best farmer of the lot. On one-half acre of land she raised sufficient potatoes and cabbage to supply her own wants, and disposed of the remainder of her crop for $100. Thus the association has demonstrated that a comfortable support can be made from working the land if it is gone about in the right way.

All Souls' Church, Rev. T. C. Williams pastor, has adopted some of the manifold ways which are now recognized as legitimate ones to help the backward social classes. In its Friendly Aid House on East 34th Street it has a most perfect plant for use in carrying on its important sociological work. This building was thrown open for inspection recently, and it was found to be a veritable "house beautiful." Its gymnasium, baths, café, library, and other educational and social opportunities ought to prove a boon to the neighborhood in which it is situated,—a neighborhood in which saloons and bad tenement homes abound.

The Church of the Messiah has just taken a step of the utmost importance to its own interests and to the interests of Unitarianism in this city and throughout the country. For some time it has been the purpose of Rev. Robert Collyer, to seek a measure of relief from the burden of his work which he feels has begun to weigh somewhat heavily upon him. This purpose he made known to his society at the annual meeting held early in the present month. So devoted are his people to him that for him to wish anything from them is to have it granted. After consultation with Mr. Collyer it was decided that so great is the present opportunity in New York for doing a magnificent work for Unitarianism that the place demands a man of no less prominence, ability, force, and sagacity as a leader than the Rev. Minot J. Savage of Boston. Mr. Savage's national reputation as a popular and eloquent preacher, and his clear, comprehensive, and masterly treatment of modern religious problems, mark him out as the one best fitted to strengthen and build up the Unitarian cause in this great city. Therefore, at a meeting of the society called for that purpose on Wednesday evening, December 18, a most hearty and unanimous call was extended to him. The Church of the Messiah has taken this step in the full conviction that its own interests and the interests of the denomination would be best served by placing Mr. Savage with Mr. Collyer in its pulpit. For it holds that nowhere except in New York, the metropolis of the New World, radiating its lines of influence to all parts of the country, can there be found for Mr. Savage such a splendid opportunity for the largest usefulness and for the most far-reaching and constructive work. It seems hardly gracious in a letter addressed to a Boston paper to dwell upon the exultation that New Yorkers are feeling over the prospect of Mr. Savage's coming here. But on every hand, among the liberal-thinking people, there are open rejoicings and congratulations that this call has been extended, and anxious solicitude that it shall be accepted.

In a previous letter an account was given of a series of Forward Movement meetings which were held in Brooklyn. Their success demonstrated the fact that there are large numbers of people ready to renounce the old harsh doctrines of Orthodoxy, and to accept the broader, sweeter Unitarian faith, whenever we employ the right means of making Unitarianism known to them. Profiting by the enthusiasm that was aroused in Brooklyn, the superintendent for the Middle States has arranged to continue these meetings in the form of regular Sunday evening services in that part of Brooklyn called the Park Slope. The ministers of the city are co-operating with him, and will each take their turn in preaching. The first service will be held on the first Sunday evening in January, and the preacher on that occasion will be Rev. Robert Collyer.

Among the attractive Christmas services held last Sunday in our churches, that at All Souls' should be mentioned. It was made particularly interesting and significant from the fact that Mr. Williams preached an appropriate and timely sermon on "Peace on Earth," in the course of which he deprecated in the strongest terms the war spirit which has been stimulated among our American people by the message of President Cleveland on the Venezuelan affair. He made a strong and able argument against "Jingoism" in all its aspects. The musical programme was rendered by a chorus choir, and was very pleasing.

M. A. M.

"NEW WORLD" GUARANTEE FUND.

Rev. W. C. Gannett writes: "There are few things I'd like so well to drop $500 into the pockets of as the New World: it seems to me so excellent of its kind and so helpful to ministers in particular. The good workmanship shown is a delight. I almost wonder that the managers have not yet found the rich man or woman who would put $20,000 into the New World as into a chair in a college. But are there not ministers, like me, for instance, who would be glad to combine in squads of four, and guarantee $100, each one being held, however, only for his own $25? You may set me down as one in Squad I."

Are there not many ministers who will act upon this plan of Mr. Gannett's?

Previously acknowledged.....	$6,950
Mrs. T. E. Hackley (cash).....	500
William Endicott, Jr.....	250
Charles P. Curtis.....	250
Rev. J. C. Perkins.....	100
Alex. S. Wheeler.....	100
Edmund Dwight.....	100
Carroll D. Wright.....	100
Epes S. Dixwell.....	100
Thomas Gaffield.....	100
A. L. Hollingsworth.....	100
Prof. James Barr Ames.....	100
R. C. Humphreys.....	100
Col. T. W. Higginson.....	100
Col. Henry Lee (cash).....	100
J. P. Hopkinson.....	50
A Friend (for permanent fund).....	25
	$9,125

WILLIAM H. LYON, Sec'y,
519 Beacon Street, Boston.

Spiritual Life.

Pain is the deepest thing we have in our nature, and union through pain has always seemed more real and more holy than any other.—Arthur H. Hallam.

Nothing less than the majesty of God and the powers of the world to come can maintain the peace and sanctity of our homes, the order and serenity of our minds, the spirit of patience and tender mercy in our hearts.—J. Martineau.

The ecstasy that fills us on a day in spring, when through budding boughs we see the shining clouds and the brilliant rain-washed blue; the eclipse of happiness in the heart of the child who feels "cross"; the willingness of love to one another, and a worthier preferred,—these are inexplicable without God.—The Coming Day.

To see that there is no life lived alone, no personality for itself, but that real success lies in what service one can render to others in love's name, will bring all one's forces into line with the highest principle of life, and conserve them for their fullest realization. With the intellectual life must be wedded the life of truth and sympathy, or it is barren: it brings no fruit to perfection. H. P. DeForest.

What a splendid symphony is life to one who knows how to interpret it, with its four movements and its one theme! For that one theme is love and God, and love and God are one. First the dance-music of childhood; then the love-music of youth; then the labor and martial music of manhood, mingled with the sweet home-music of womanhood, with strains of pathetic minor enriching both; and last of all the peace-song of old age.—Outlook.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.

The Executive Board held its monthly meeting at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, on December 13, at 10.30 A.M., ten ladies being present. In the absence of the president, Mrs. Wells presided; and, after the usual business routine, Mrs. Peterson reported for fourteen Branches in Suffolk County. All these Branches are beginning the new year with much earnestness, and present indications point to a prosperous year in every department of Alliance work. The work of the Arlington Street Branch is the same as usual, an increased number of letters having been received by the Post-office Mission Committee. The Church of the Disciples Branch has taken up a course of Emerson studies, suggested by Mr. Gannett's Leaflet on Emerson. One barrel and sixteen boxes of miscellaneous literature have been sent to different places South and West since April. Second Church Branch reports much interest in Mr. Gibson's work at Bristol and Mt. Pleasant, Fla. At the Church of the Unity Mr. Savage has given the first of a series of lectures on "The Universe." This Branch is sending out large quantities of literature and letters. South Congregational Branch held its annual meeting in November, when Mrs. Whitman gave an interesting account of her visit to Jennie Dean's Colored School at Manassas. Dr. Hale was spoken of as Miss Dean's early and strong friend, and one of the buildings will be called the "Hale Building." The Branch at the First Parish, Dorchester, reports a very large attendance and a delightful programme. All Souls' Church Branch continues the plan of a morning session, with lunch and a social hour. Rev. Mr. Lyon has begun a series of Bible lessons. Jamaica Plain Branch has sent $70 to Hampton for a scholarship for a girl in the senior class, whose expenses have been borne by this Branch in previous years. First Religious Society, Roxbury, has a flourishing Post-office Mission and Cheerful Letter Exchange, and has sent $25 to Green Harbor. New South Branch feels keenly the loss of its minister, but is working as earnestly as ever. The Hawes Church Branch has increased in membership, and has an excellent Post-office Mission Committee. First Parish, Brighton, Branch has given a reception to Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Walkley, and has held a fair to help pay for a new organ. Has sent a box of service and hymn books to Pine Mountain, Tenn. Harvard Church, Charlestown, is much interested in Mr. Dillingham's work at Calhoun. Chelsea Branch has given a reception to the new minister, and completed a course of lectures. These Branches hold monthly meetings at 25 Beacon Street; and Mrs. Peterson says: "The reports call out many questions; and much that is helpful is brought to notice, and discussed. In this way, I believe, each Branch may find it profitable to be represented at each of these monthly meetings."

Miss Waldo, as director for Essex County, reports that the interest expressed by the Branches, as they begin their work, has been very gratifying. One new Branch has been formed in the old church in Beverly. The Branch was formed from the old parish society, and they expect new life and inspiration. The Lynn Branch is doing excellent work, and has sent $5 to North Platte, $5 to Proctor Academy, $1 for Japan Library, 50 cents to Evanston, Ill., and 50 cents to Memphis. The energetic Branch at Lawrence is full of life, and has an attendance at meetings of sixty or seventy. The report speaks with feeling of the death of Miss Putnam. The Haverhill Branch is working for a fair, and members read while they sew. The Newburyport Branch has been addressed by some fine speakers. Still, the secretary is somewhat troubled; for she thinks the objects of the Alliance are something more than entertainment. The Salem Branches are, as usual, most active, with regular meetings, lectures, etc. Barton Square has held a fair, and sent a Christmas box to Montana. $10 has been given to the Ministers' Relief Fund, $2 to Japan Library, and $150 to its own church. The North Church Branch appropriated $15 for the Saturday Club, $5 to North Platte, and $5 for Japan Library. Mrs. Richardson reported for Ayer. Littleton, which has sent $5 to Proctor Academy, Pepperell, Westford, and Lowell, in all of which much good work is done. In Lowell the following subject has been discussed, "What do 'Women's Columns,' 'Women's Pages,' and 'Women's Specialties' indicate as to the Seriousness of Women's Lives?'"

At Quincy the Branch is more prosperous than ever, and plans for Bible study and discussion. Brookline continues "The Study of the Sects." This Branch has sent $25 to Tuskegee and $25 to Calhoun, with barrels of books to Bristol and Provincetown.

Dedham, Longwood, Canton, and Third Religious Society, Dorchester, are most prosperous. Milton has sent $5 to Proctor Academy. The Leicester Branch is building a much needed addition to its church, but has sent $5 to "Country Week" and a barrel of clothing to Tuskegee. The Branch at Uxbridge has sent $10 to Calhoun for a day pupil's tuition. Worcester South Branch report successful meetings and money given to local work. Athol Centre is busy providing the means to run its own church. The Worcester League has held most interesting and valuable meetings, and has sent $10 to Mrs. Whitney's fair. Among the most interesting Branches in Massachusetts are those recently formed on the Cape, including Sandwich, Brewster, and Cohasset. The Branch in Plymouth is looking forward to its new church. The Hingham Branch has an excellent programme for the winter, and has sent $5 to the Japan Library.

The director of the Channing Conference reports the six Branches under her charge to be in a "healthy, growing condition." The Taunton Branch numbers over one hundred members, and has sent $10 to Rev. Mr. Headle at Rockville, Conn. At the First Church in Providence a room in the chapel is open every Tuesday afternoon, as a reading-room for those interested in Unitarian literature.

The director from New Hampshire reports that she has received enthusiastic and ready accounts of plans for the winter from each of the Branches under her care. "Not one Branch falters or lags behind; and I am sure that New Hampshire is gaining ground, and is ready to do most effective work in the interest of the Alliance." The new Branch at Portsmouth, organized October 1, has now seventy-six members.

Reports from eight Branches in Maine—Bangor, Portland, Saco, Waterville, Augusta, Eastport, Houlton, and Farmington—show much perseverance and energy in the attendance on meetings and in carrying out plans of work.

From the Pacific Coast the reports are concise, but of great interest. In Alameda there are sixty members doing much to advance and sustain Unitarianism in Alameda. They have contributed to the Sunday-school, and have given $500 to the trustees for the use of the church. Berkeley has eleven new members, and has given $25 for hymn-books and $200 to the minister's salary. Two members have been elected to the church board of trustees. Oakland has been addressed by Mrs. Wilkes and Mrs. Carr. The Channing Auxiliary, San Francisco, has a membership of two hundred and twenty, and has given $50 to Mrs. Carr, $50 to the church at Berkeley, and has a fund of $500 for its work. This society has recently become incorporated. The Society for Christian Work Branch meets twice each month, with fine programmes. These two San Francisco societies shared in an open-air fête in September, each receiving $514.80, which will enable them to carry out many plans. At Santa Maria the Ladies' Alliance pledged itself in July to raise $50. By the aid of a birthday party, a social, and a chrysanthemum fair the members have paid $25 toward the pledge.

It will be remembered that the Women's Unitarian Conference of the Pacific Coast have authorized Rev. E. T. Wilkes to undertake Unitarian preaching in the smaller towns of California, with a view to extend the growth of liberal thought. Services have been held in Hayward, Vacaville, Woodland, and Palo Alto. In all these places the reception has been cordial, and the work seems of especial promise and value. In consideration of the satisfactory reports of this movement the Executive Board of the Alliance calls attention to the most excellent missionary work done, under the direction of the Women's Unitarian Conference of the Pacific Coast, by Rev. Eliza T. Wilkes, who is also preaching at Stanford University.

The Committee on Appeals recommends the church at Sharon, Mass., Mrs. E. M. Hickok, minister. The society is small, and does all it can, but greatly needs $100 to make up the minister's salary of only $600 a year. Will the Alliance Branches help a little?

"Study-class Leaflets, Nos. 2 and 3," are out of print, but will be reissued at once. The Cheerful Letter has a larger number of actual subscribers than ever before, but still wishes more. Extra copies of the last months have been sent to Atlanta.

The following communication from the vice-president for the South was read, and seemed of so great importance that it was voted to present it to the Branches in full:

"In compliance with a suggestion that I should present at this December meeting of the Executive Board the especial needs of the South for the coming year, the following statement is made:—

"First, Austin: Important as are other branches of our work, it is of the first necessity that this work be sustained. The report of Rev. Mr. Wheelock's sermons, by B. T. in 'Church News' in the October, November, and December numbers of the Southern Unitarian, will show the scope and direction of his preaching.

"Unless he can rely upon a salary sufficient to meet his expenses, he may feel obliged to resign his pulpit. Austin is the seat of the State University; and Mr. Wheelock's congregations are large and appreciative, though many are students or other non-contributing members. While the American Unitarian Association contributes to the support of the church and the people themselves are doing all that can be expected of them, considering their numbers and pecuniary ability, the church must depend to a considerable degree upon the Alliance and other friends.

"Second, Richmond: Rev. Mr. Saton, the minister in charge, was ordained at the last session of the Southern Conference at Baltimore in April. He was enabled to return to his work there solely by the aid of money appropriated by the Alliance Branch of the Church of the Unity, Boston, as no appropriation has yet been made by the American Unitarian Association for the year. The Association Board does not make its Southern appropriations before the January meeting; and the Richmond people, who had held lay services regularly for three months, were anxious for the earlier return of a minister. A very satisfactory hall has been secured and underlet for week-days. The attendance is increasing. Last Sunday, with simply the usual announcements, the congregation was thirty in the morning and fifty in the evening. There is a strong attachment between pastor and people, and an earnest desire and effort among the people to do all in their power. Money is most carefully spent here, and anything sent this church will be most heartily welcomed. They are in no condition to hold a fair at present, but may ask assistance in that direction another year. Richmond, then, we recommend most heartily.

"At Chattanooga the Women's Alliance has pledged itself to raise $200 toward the support of the church this year. The ladies will hold a Christmas sale on the 19th of December. Contributions of goods or money will be gratefully received by Mrs. E. H. Price, 404 Georgia Avenue. Money may be sent the day after the fair, if necessary, and yet figure in the receipts. This is the crucial year with Chattanooga.

"Memphis is working hard. It has to raise a great deal of money. The American Unitarian Association appropriation pays a little over one-third of the minister's salary. The remaining two-thirds and the current expenses of the church are raised by the people. Lately services are held in the New Lyceum Theatre on Sunday evenings. The seven services arranged continue from November 3 to December 15, inclusive. Even the rainy-night audiences have been four hundred, and there are six hundred or seven hundred present on favorable evenings. Mr. Clare is an able preacher. Help Memphis with all you can give.

"Mr. Gibson of Florida and Mr. Dukes of North Carolina are working in fields untitled by other liberal Christians. They are earnest men, working in the true spirit among people grateful and responsive to their word, and yet able to do little for their support. Unless we help them, no one will. Mr. Gibson has organized two churches recently. That at Bristol numbers thirty members. Anything sent to Rev. J. C. Gibson, Edwards, Fla., or Rev. J. G. Dukes, Wallace, N.C., will be most gratefully received and acknowledged by them.

"Opportunities to employ men of ability and zeal are so frequent that we can only regret that we cannot put into new places those whose knowledge of the field, knowledge of methods, interest, and eagerness might be employed at mere living cost. For ability to do that we can only pray for a special dispensation of knowledge as to the way to unloose the purse-strings of Unitarians who have full purses. The American Unitarian Association does all it can for the South, in justice to the other demands made upon it. But the best it can do is inadequate to the mission work to be done, which must be done, if Unitarians are just to the opportunities put into their hands. The Women's Alliance has also been generous. If those who have given will continue to give, and if those who have not given will remember the South, the white people, the Unitarians of the South, in their division of gifts, we who work there will take heart again, and be grateful. To enumerate again the places sorely needing all they may receive,—Austin, Memphis, Richmond, Chattanooga, Rev. J. C. Gibson, and Rev. J. G. Dukes.

"The Unitarian Exhibit in Atlanta has met to the full the expectations of those who planned it. The appropriation of the American Unitarian Association, with the personal contributions of those interested in having such an exhibit, secured a fine collection of the portraits and works of prominent Unitarians, clergy and laity, attractively arranged in comfortable quarters. A full collection of the publications of the Sunday School Societies, Eastern and Western, and of the American Unitarian Association, is shown. More than three thousand tracts have been judiciously distributed in two months,—not thrown broadcast,—most helpful conversations have taken place, many inquiries have been answered, the names of a great many people desiring sermons to be sent them regularly have been taken, and visitors from all over the United States have registered. The photographs of a hundred and fifty of our clergy are shown in albums, and nearly enough to fill another book have been received. No one could spend a day there without being convinced that the exhibit is worth all it cost. Every member of the Women's Alliance may feel that she has personally contributed to the success of this undertaking; for it is on account of the appropriation of an amount sufficient to pay the travelling and other necessary expenses that Miss Everett, who has taken this work as a labor of love, is enabled to be here. She is always present at the exhibit; and her knowledge of our theology, of our church resources and history, and of its conduct and methods, enables her to fill this important post as perhaps no one else could do. And this work is not without its discomforts and annoyances. As there is no way of warming the building, and the cold has been sufficient to freeze the water in the metal vase holding our chrysanthemums, no small amount of physical endurance is required. There are still three weeks of work before the close of the Exposition, and they may prove to be the most fruitful ones."

It was unanimously voted that "the Executive Board recommends to the Branches the circuit and other work at the South as of the utmost immediate importance, as the Unitarian Exhibit at the Atlanta Exposition is emphasizing its needs. Contributions may be sent to Rev. G. L. Chaney or to Mrs. Chaney, or through the Alliance treasurer.

Two earnest calls for books have been received,—one for the Sunday-school in Salt Lake City, the other for the Icelanders at Winnipeg. Branches are desired to send boxes or barrels of (good) books to Rev. A. L. Hudson, 35 South Fifth, East, Salt Lake City, Utah, and to Rev. Magnus J. Skaptason, 648 William Avenue, Winnipeg, Manitoba. Parcels and single books may be sent by mail or to 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.; and it is hoped that each Alliance member may give one book, if not one to each place.

Before its adjournment the Executive Board passed the following resolution: "The Board wishes to place on record an expression of its deep sorrow at the death of Rev. Helen G. Putnam, and of its high appreciation of her self-sacrificing labors, high aims, and excellent success in preaching and teaching the Unitarian faith from house to house and church to church in Dakota and elsewhere."

The next meeting will be held January 10, when reports are due from Branches in the Middle States, Southern States, and Middle West.

EMILY A. FIFIELD, Rec. Sec'y.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

Three books by George D. Herron, D.D., entitled "A Plea for the Gospel," "The New Redemption," "The Christian State." These are small books of about one hundred pages each. Prof. Herron's work is now attracting a great deal of attention. He spoke in Channing Hall in this building quite recently, and made a decided impression upon those who heard him. His views are not familiar to many, and these books will help those who desire to learn what he advocates with so much earnestness and ability. Price 56 cents, net.

"The Golden Rule in Business," by Rev. Charles F. Dole, a small publication by the Chautauqua Century Press, a capital treatment of the subject. This little book is worthy to have a very wide reading. Every business man would be better for a careful reading of it; and employers could not do a better thing than to put it in the hands of every clerk and every workman, who could understand it, in his employ. It may be made to do a very valuable work. Price 15 cents.

It may not be generally understood that we have the following publications on our tables for sale at these rooms,—the New World, the Unitarian, the Christian Register, the Lend a Hand. We also have Dr. Hale's short stories in attractive bindings: "Tell it Again" series, "Hands Off," "Aunt Caroline's Present," "One Good Turn." Price 40 cents each. These little volumes are very useful for holiday gifts; and, by the way, would it not be a good thing for you, when you read this, to look over our book-list, and see if you cannot find something that you would like to give your minister or your Sunday-school superintendent at Christmas? Books are always acceptable and useful. Do you think you really appreciate the work the Sunday-school workers do for your church? What would become of the church if we let our young people drift away, and our children grow up without any thought of the church and their relations to it? It is certainly right, prudent, and just to remember those who are doing the work that, perhaps, you ought to be doing yourself.

The Year Book for 1896 will, in all probability, be ready for distribution by the day before Christmas. This book is sent to the life members of the American Unitarian Association. All others can procure copies from these rooms by sending 20 cents for it.

The lectures given by Rev. Mr. Pulsford on Saturday afternoons, to our Sunday-school teachers, are very interesting and helpful; and many more of our friends might come and enjoy them if they wanted to do so. Channing Hall is large enough for many more, and no doubt Mr. Pulsford would be glad to have them come.

Mr. Batchelor is away this week, visiting the Southern churches. We hope that he will be able to discover some way in which our work can be strengthened and improved in the South, although the financial depression makes it very difficult for the Association to cover so wide a field with its work in the most effective way.

The news from the Western field is quite encouraging. The new work there gives great promise of success. The fact is that with sufficient means we could do a very great work in the near future. There has never been a time when the prospect was more inviting. But the trouble is that the outflow pipe in our tank is considerably larger than the inflow pipe just now.

Perhaps things will be better pretty soon. Let us all try to make them so: then things will be better, surely.

FINANCES.

The later contributions from the churches show some improvement, and there are some faint signs of a realizing sense of shortcoming among those who have sent in smaller contributions than heretofore; and some evidences are in sight that these short contributions will be made up,—that is, that another contribution will be taken.

It would be a great improvement in our methods if our churches would give us a fall and a spring contribution: then we should avoid burdening those who could subscribe better at some other time than the one now in use. And some earnest soul, that wanted to give, might be in prosperity at one of those dates, although in adversity at the other.

It may as well be understood now as later that, unless the Association receives from some quarter more than it did last year, its policy of expenditure will have to be revised and adjusted to a smaller scale. It is a matter of very great importance to those who have the Unitarian cause at heart that this contingency should receive early and earnest attention. The "General Fund" is no longer available for making up deficiencies between receipts and expenditures; and the only relief possible must come from voluntary subscriptions, either by individuals or churches.

VISITS.

December 9, Boston Association of Ministers to talk about denominational matters,—a very interesting occasion.

Wednesday, December 11, Boston Unitarian Club at the Vendome. The meetings of this strong organization are always interesting and instructive. On this occasion we had the pleasure of listening to a clear and strong paper from Prof. Peabody, and a stirring address by Rev. Dr. George A. Gordon of the Old South Congregational Church. Dr. Gordon wins all hearts by his frank and courageous methods of dealing with his subjects. It is impossible to listen to him without a thorough respect for his ability and sincerity.

December 13, Providence, R.I., the Unitarian Club at Trocadero Hall,—a large gathering. The meeting was addressed by Mrs. L. Ormiston Chant, Rev. W. H. Lyon of Roxbury, Rev. Thomas R. Slicer of Buffalo, and the treasurer of the A. U. A. The endurance of the audience was thoroughly tested, and they bore the ordeal with unusual fortitude; but there was no mistaking the evidences of weariness, until Mr. Slicer came in with his awakening and inspiring utterances.

The hospitality of the club was generous and hearty, and let us hope that good may result from the meeting.

Sunday, December 15, Peterboro, N.H., preaching morning and evening in the Town Hall, a neat and commodious building. The Unitarian society in Peterboro is thoroughly overhauling and refinishing the interior of its church building; and during the time necessary for this work they are occupying the Town Hall. The congregations were good at both services, although an orthodox revival meeting was in progress, being conducted by the united efforts of the different churches in the town, with assistance from ministers from a distance. If any one doubts the usefulness of Unitarian churches, let them take the time and trouble to attend one of these "revival" meetings, and note what it is that is being revived.

The "revival," however, did not affect the attendance of the meetings in the Town Hall unfavorably.

The Unitarians of Peterboro can be trusted to keep the fires burning upon the altar. The scenery among the hills that surround this pleasant village, the towering form of old Monadnock, and the glorious air of this elevated region ought to impart to the people who dwell there spiritual strength enough to lift them out of the old and narrow views of religion, and into a higher and serener confidence in the divine beneficence.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

The Sunday School.

The Channing Hall "Talks" will be resumed next Saturday, December 28, at 2.30 o'clock, by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. The subject treated will be Lesson XV., "The Lighted Candle." All cordially invited.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—An unusually large audience met at the Church of the Disciples Monday, December 16, to discuss "The Mutual Relation of Minister and Sunday-school." There were eight speakers on the evening's programme. Miss Margaret B. Barnard of Chelsea, who first spoke, believed that students in the divinity schools should have better opportunity of becoming acquainted with Sunday-school work. The minister should be the court of appeal, and not a Court of Common Pleas. Rev. William H. Fish of Dedham believes that the minister's chief hope and encouragement lie in the Sunday-school, and says that he finds he can best reach the young through the confirmation class. A few weeks before Easter he invites the boys and girls of fifteen or sixteen years to meet him weekly or fortnightly for a talk which shall throw the emphasis on the religious side of life. Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge of Dorchester is opposed to the minister's being the superintendent of the Sunday-school, as he thinks the influence of the clergyman greater, if it be divested of all official relation; but he would have the pastor present at the opening exercises to aid in maintaining the spirit of devotion or occasionally to conduct some special programme for the day. The next speaker was Mr. Lyman R. Greenman of Cambridge, who says that the minister may be of great service by coming into close personal relations with school and scholars. To do this, he must be there every Sunday; and it would be well if he should at the close of the session sum up the day's work in a five-minute talk or devote a few minutes sometimes to a talk on some great truths of our belief. Rev. William H. Johnson of Cambridgeport expressed surprise that there should be in any mind a question as to the relation of church and school. The school is the junior church, where the pupils receive lessons which they can understand. The Roslindale school was represented by Mr. William I. Scandlin. If in the Sunday-school of the present is to be found the church of the future, the relations cannot be too sympathetic, cordial, and even personal. Mrs. L. A. Kimberley of West Newton differed from most of the speakers in asserting it to be the duty of the minister to be superintendent, because he holds such a relation to the children that they do not question his right to speak to them on subjects which they feel should not be broached by others. She also differed from those who think the minister should be teacher of a class, since he is needed by the whole school, and not by the few. If he conduct teachers' meetings, he will thus have a most beneficial unity of interest with the teachers. The last speaker was Rev. William H. Lyon of Roxbury, who said that he thought not so much of his duty to the school as of the good which the school did to him. He considers that minister indeed fortunate who has the power to speak to the children so as to guide their future. If he cannot do this thing, he should strive to find a superintendent who can do it for him.

Religious Intelligence.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.—The next meeting of the New England Associate Alliance will be held in Salem on Thursday, February 27. The invitation comes from the Branch connected with the Barton Square Church.

THE Ministerial Union will meet in Channing Hall, Boston, Monday, December 30, at 10.30 A.M. The address will be given by Rev. William R. Alger. Subject, "The Antichrists of Christendom." The public is invited.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Charles G. Ames will conduct the noon service on Wednesday, January 1.

Bulfinch Place Church: Rev. S. W. Brooke will preach on "The Poet," Sunday evening, December 29, at eight o'clock.

Roxbury, All Souls' Church: A "watch meeting" will be held at eleven o'clock Tuesday night, December 31. Mrs. L. Ormiston Chant and the minister of the church will conduct the services. All are cordially invited to welcome the New Year in this way. A car for the city will probably leave the church at 12.15.

The next meeting of the Ministers' League will be held at 25 Beacon Street, Monday, December 30, at 2 P.M. Superintendent Wilson will be present to talk upon matters connected with his work. Other speakers will follow. It is hoped that there will be a large attendance, as important business will be up for consideration. Leverett R. Daniels, Secretary.

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Rev. Mary T. Whitney will speak next Sunday evening, December 29, at 7.30 o'clock. Subject, "What do we mean by Practical Religion?" Music by Mrs. Louise Bruce Brooks, alto, and Mr. Frederick W. Jameson, tenor. All seats free, and a welcome.

The Ministers' Monday Club passed resolutions of sympathy on the death of Rev. Obed Eldridge, as follows:—

"Inasmuch as our brother and fellow-worker in the ministry, Rev. Obed Eldridge, beloved by us, has left us, we desire to express our esteem for him as a minister and a Christian gentleman. He was unselfish, enthusiastic, and deeply interested in his work and in all work for the highest welfare of humanity. With the patience of a martyr and the firmness of a hero he bore his trying illness. In his heart God's kingdom of righteousness had already come, preparing him for the spiritual life into which he has entered."

(Signed) PHILIP S. THACHER,
"ALFRED E. MULLETT,
"LEVERETT R. DANIELLS,
"Committee."

ARCADIA, WIS.—A series of meetings were held here December 12, 13, 14, and 15, that were quite successful. The audiences were good for a country town, and steadily increased. The interest also deepened day by day. Those who participated were Pastor Owen, Rev. Messrs. F. C. Davis of Winona, Charles F. Niles of Menomonie, and T. B. Forbush of Chicago. Arcadia is only a country village, and the congregation is always slender; yet there have gone out from it during the last twelve years more than a hundred men and women, mostly young, to take their part in the life of the larger communities of the West. Is it not worth while to keep the fire burning on these minor altars for the sake of the contributions these churches so steadily make to the welfare of the world? These remote parishes may never be self-sustaining; but they send out fresh, pure streams to invigorate the life-blood of humanity.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.—Rev. John C. Kimball of Ann Arbor occupied the pulpit of the Independent Congregational Church on Sunday morning and evening, in exchange of pulpits with Rev. Mr. Horner.

The recent joint conference of Unitarians, Universalists, and Independent societies was a pronounced success, the different elements blending perfectly in the deliberations and in inaugurating vigorous missionary undertakings throughout the State. The Independent Congregational Society here, over which Rev. T. J. Horner was ordained as pastor by the conference, is a marvel of numbers and vigor. The regular audiences range from six to eight hundred, and the Sunday-school is of corresponding size.

BELMONT, MASS.—The regular monthly meeting of the South Middlesex Branches of the Women's Alliance will be held at the Unitarian Building on Thursday, January 2, at twelve o'clock.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. William F. Furman of Providence will preach in the First Parish Church on Sunday next, December 29.

CLINTON, MASS.—Rev. Christopher C. Hussey, formerly of Billerica, Mass., who has been preaching at Clinton for the past few Sundays with great acceptance, has been asked to supply the pulpit until the 1st of February.

GREELEY, COL.—Rev. C. Howard Wilson, to the regret of all concerned, has been compelled by illness to resign his position as pastor of Unity Church. Mr. Oscar B. Hawes of Cambridge, Mass., has been called to take Mr. Wilson's place.

KEENE, N.H.—The Unitarian Club of Keene, N.H., met on Friday evening, December 13, with an attendance of seventy-five members and guests. The president, Dr. George B. Twitchell, presided. Hon. Sherman Hoar of Concord, Mass., spoke to the club on the theme "A Day with a Member of Congress." The address was a very happy statement of the labor and vicissitudes of the average day for a member of Congress. It was full of bright and suggestive ideas, and gave great pleasure to all the members of the club. After a few words from different speakers the club was adjourned for a month.

JACKSON, MICH.—Rev. Walter A. Taylor, who has been supplying at this place for the last three years, was, at the society's annual meeting held December 8, unanimously and enthusiastically re-elected pastor for another year. Jackson is a busy, growing town; and Mr. Taylor is greatly respected among all classes of its citizens, and is doing in it a valuable work.

SALEM, MASS.—The First Church will be open for a series of special services Sunday evenings in January. The East Church Guild is flourishing, and has invited the Barton Square Guild to join in its Christmas service December 29. The guild of the Barton Square Church recently formed has held several interesting meetings. The young people have taken hold of this work with much spirit. The North Church was the scene of a pleasant service on the 22d of December, when the four Unitarian Sunday-schools united in a Christmas service at 3 P.M. The Alliance of the North Church invited the Alliances of Salem and vicinity to their vestry December 12 to hear Rev. Mr. Dillingham speak on "The Calhoun School." The meeting was very fully attended, and was very pleasant to all.

WESTBORO, MASS.—The Westboro Chronicle published in a recent issue a sermon of Rev. J. H. Weeks, with the title "Wanted: A Christian." On Thanksgiving Day a union service was held at the Baptist church of the place, in which the different denominations were represented, the Unitarians alone being excluded on the ground that they are not Christians. The aim of the sermon was to show what a Christian is, and how far Unitarians should claim the name. It was an earnest, thoughtful appeal for the religion of Jesus.

WINONA, MINN.—The ordination of Mr. J. C. Allen, late of the Meadville School, took place Monday evening, December 16. The invocation and Scripture lesson were by Rev. F. C. Davis, the sermon and ordaining prayer by Rev. T. B. Forbush, the charge and fellowship of the churches by Rev. F. C. Davis. The address of ordination and installation was by W. C. Brown, Esq., of Winona, who in the name of the congregation ordained and installed Mr. Allen as its minister. During the last two months five young men have been ordained in the Central West; and in each case the old Congregational method has been adhered to, and the congregation, either by its own voice or by the voice of its official head, has performed the act of ordination and installation. It indicates a revival of the Congregational forms and spirit among our Western churches.

General Religious Notes.

The present crisis in educational affairs in England was discussed at a special meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Presbyterians and Unitarians of Lancashire and Cheshire, held in London. Rev. R. A. Armstrong presided, and explained the resolutions, which were to be offered, as protesting against the granting further State aid to the voluntary schools, branding as usurpation the application of money publicly granted for educational purposes to denominational ends, and resisting "that policy of a clerical capture of the people's schools which has the benediction of Lord Salisbury."

Le Protestant, the journal of liberal Christians in France, thinks that the chances of holding a Parliament of Religions in Paris in 1900 depend mainly on the state of the pope's health or on his successor. Leo XIII. is understood to favor the plan, judging, probably, from the warm support it receives from journals like Le Monde and Le Gaulois; but he is old and feeble, and the high ecclesiastical dignitaries of France hesitate to declare themselves. Had it not been for his supposed approval, Le Protestant thinks the idea would have been dropped as soon as formulated.

Business Notices.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are unequalled for clearing the voice. Public speakers and singers the world over use them.

A Noteworthy Exhibit.—Some of the finest old pieces of eighteenth century furniture have this season been skillfully reproduced, and are now on sale at Patne's, on Canal Street. These old historic shapes are of absorbing interest to the student of times and manners, and it is not easy to visit these warerooms during this exhibition and come away without purchasing.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Deaths.

In North Uxbridge, 18th Inst., Dandridge G. Taft, in the 68th year of his age.
In Luzerne, Switzerland, 21st ult., E. Herbert Clapp, formerly of Boston, Mass. Buried in Germantown, Pa., December 24.

DIVINE DISCONTENT.

Be not content, contentment means inaction;
The growing soul aches on its upward quest;
Satiety is twin to satisfaction;
All great achievements spring from life's unrest.

The tiny roots, deep in the dark mould hiding,
Would never bless the earth with leaf and flower,
Were not an inborn restlessness abiding
In seed and germ to stir them with its power.

Were man contented with his lot forever,
He had not sought strange seas with sails unfurled;
And the vast wonder of our shores had never
Dawned on the gaze of an admiring world.

Prize what is yours, but be not quite contented;
There is a healthful restlessness of soul
By which a mighty purpose is augmented,
In urging men to reach a higher goal.

So, when the restless impulse rises, driving
Your calm content before it, do not grieve:
It is the upward reaching and the striving
Of the God in you to achieve, achieve.
—Author unknown.

The Pulpit.

THE GREATER PURITANISM.*

BY REV. FRANCIS G. PEARBODY.

"These all, having had witness borne to them through their faith, received not the promise, God having provided some better thing concerning us, that apart from us they should not be made perfect."—HEBR. xi. 39, 40.

This is a very remarkable view of the place and office of the Old Testament. The heroes of that dispensation, according to this writer to the Hebrews, were all witnesses of faith. Their history was a religious history. From Abel to the prophets, all had lived and died in faith, and what they had achieved was done under the living sense of the authority of God. And yet they never completed their own work; they never realized their own ideal; they did not receive the promise. They did things which seemed to later generations unjustifiable and deplorable. Jacob cheating his brother, David wronging his friend, Rahab the harlot, and Samson the tool of a harlot,—all these are included by this writer in his catalogue of the heroes of faith. The imperfections of the Old Testament, that is to say, are squarely faced. And yet, through this varied history of spiritual vision and sensual shortcomings, of primitive faith and primitive morals, there was, this writer sees, a continuous preparation for the better things which God had provided for those who should come after. Apart from us, he says, this prophetic past is not made perfect. Many things then revered had come to seem blots on history. God had provided better things for us. Yet ancient Israel builded better than she knew, and the greatness of her history lay, not in its achievements, but in its unconscious preparation for a better future. Her beliefs perished, while her ideals survived. Nothing could be more contrary to much of the Old Testament than the spirit of Jesus Christ. Indeed, he was put to death for heresy toward the law. Yet he always held that the spirit of Israel was perpetuated in his gospel, that the law and the prophets were fulfilled in him, that the faith which had glorified his people's history made possible his larger mission, as the growth of the stem and branch makes possible the blossoming flower. Thus there was a lesser Israel and a greater; and, while the lesser passed away, the greater Israel was the foundation of Christianity. Looking back on all that mingled story of aspiration and limitation, this New Testament writer sees its temporary traits drop away, and its essential faith accomplishing its evolution in the better things provided for the later time. "Therefore," he says, "seeing that we are compassed about by these witnesses, let us run with patience the race that is now set before ourselves."

Two hundred and seventy-five years ago this November the "Mayflower" made her first harbor at Provincetown, and in December a little expedition was sent in the ship's shallop to circumnavigate the bay and find a better home. "The water froze in their clothes," says the simple record, "and made them many times like coats of iron." A flight of Indian arrows fell among the little party as they breakfasted one day on the beach. Their rudder was disabled in a storm of snow and sleet. Their mast was carried away. At last, with great difficulty, they got under the lee of a small island, and landed on it on Friday night, and kept their Sabbath. The Monday following—the day corresponding to December 21, but which for a century and a half has been kept on December 22—the battered little boatload made a landing on the opposite shore. "They sounded," as they write, "the harbor, and marched into the land, and found divers cornfields and little running brooks,—a place very good for situation." So they returned to their people at Provincetown with this good news, which, as the story says, "did much comfort their hearts." Such was the first preliminary landing at Plymouth of these sturdy explorers, self-exiled and undis-mayed, whose stock gave its character to New England. We come, indeed, in this community of a different strain; and the traditions and intentions of Church of Eng-land Puritanism would seem to have kept the founders of our colony far from the in-fluence of the Separatists of Plymouth. But spiritual kinship had its way; and, when after nine years the Puritan migra-tion came to Salem, it promptly accepted the method of the Pilgrims. Candidly and nobly Gov. Endicott writes to Gov. Brad-ford: "God's people are marked with one and the same mark, and sealed with one and the same seal. . . . I am satisfied touch-ing your judgment of the outward form of God's worship." Thus, by legitimate spiri-tual descent, we of this college are derived from the lineage of the Plymouth Separatists through their kindred of Massachusetts Bay, who made it, as is written on our college gate, "one of the first things they longed for and looked after, to advance learning and perpetuate it to posterity" by founding this Puritan college. The college was the natural fruit of the spirit which so soon made Separatists and Puritans at one. When John Harvard, in his turn, crossed from England, with that little library which he bequeathed to the high school at Newtowne, and of which but a single vol-ume now survives, one of those books was the Essays of John Robinson, the pastor of the Pilgrims at Leyden. Perhaps it is the very book which he holds on his knee, as he sits in effigy yonder, with the western sunshine lighting up the dream of the fut-ure in his face. And so, as that little shallop, almost shipwrecked by the storm, struggled under the lee of Clark's Island with its disabled rudder and its broken mast, it bore within itself the destinies of this university; and, rightly and reverently, we look back from the better things which God has provided concerning us, and com-memorate our Forefathers' Day.

The story of the Pilgrims, and still more the story of New England Puritanism, re-produces in many ways the story of ancient Israel. There was the same sacrifice for religious faith: there was the same inti-mate sense of Jehovah's control; there was the same migration to a strange land; the same limitation and exclusiveness of creed. New England was, indeed, practi-cally constructed on the model of the Old Testament. Its laws were Hebraic, and its children were baptized with the names of Barzillai and Ephraim, of Deborah and Mehitabel. But, underlying all these like-nesses of detail, there is the profound analogy which my text describes,—the unconscious and unintended preparation by the Puritans for better things. The Puritan has been called the founder of our civil and religious liberty; and, in a large sense, this is true. Yet the fact is that nothing was farther than this intention from his conscious thought. On the contrary, he meant to found a commonwealth of extreme illiberal-ity. "Democracy," wrote John Cotton in 1636, "I do not conceive that ever God did ordain as a fit government either in church or commonwealth." The Puritan exiled Roger Williams as a disturber of the peace. He dealt with the Quakers under the name of "persistent intruders." No man might be a freeman except as a member of his church. So felt the Hebrews to the de-spised stranger in their midst, and the Puritans simply regarded themselves as an-other peculiar people of God in the midst of the unconverted. And yet, as there was a greater Israel, so there was a greater Puritanism. Within that gnarly shell of stern conformity there was ripening, half unrecog-nized by Puritanism itself, a more genial fruit. All unawares, the lesser Puritanism gave way, and the greater Puritanism emerged. The letter perished, and the spirit had life. The Puritan thought he could have the exclusive domination of a small colony, and his scheme failed; but, instead of realizing his scheme, he became the spiritual inspiration of a continent. He meant to identify Church and State, and establish an intolerant oligarchy; but again he failed, and within twenty years after Plymouth was settled Church and State began to be separated, and the Puritan became the sponsor of religious liberty. He meant to be loyal to his mother country, but again he failed; and it was his inde-pendent spirit which foreordained the re-public. He meant to be loyal to his mother Church. His first ministers were ordained priests of the Church of England; and, as Higginson sailed for Salem, he is said to have stood at the stern of the ship, and cried: "We will not say, as the Separatists are wont to say at their leaving of England, 'Farewell, Babylon! farewell, Rome!' but we will say, 'Farewell, dear England! fare-well, the Church of God in England!' We do not go to New England as separatists from the Church of England, but we go to practise the positive part of church refor-mation." So the Puritan intended; but within that very year he had joined with those same Separatists in their ways of worship, and Gov. Bradford came from Plymouth to give—as the record says—"ap-probation and concurrence" at the ordina-tion of this same Higginson over a church whose only charter was the New Testament, and whose only allies were those same Sep-aratists. Finally, the leaders of Puritanism meant to make of this college a minister-governed institution, and it is quite terrible to consider how nearly Cotton Mather came to being our president; but, with a wisdom which must have been almost instinctive, not a word of such limitation crept into the statutes of the college, and from its begin-ning, and at the hands of a community singularly devoted to their own opinions, the college was dedicated to comprehensiv-ness, liberty, and truth. So, like the peo-ple of Israel, the Puritans builded better than they knew. It was as if some timid band of sailors should plan to cruise along some well-known coast, and as if, in the night, some great current of the ocean should sweep their vessel away through the darkness, and they woke to find themselves the discoverers of a land which was nobler than their own familiar shores, but which they had never meant to reach. So the Puritanism of the letter was swept on by the greater currents of the Puritanism of the spirit, with its conscious purpose in the hands of that greater destiny foretold for it in the great words of its prophet, John Robinson: "If God shall reveal any-thing to you by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive anything by my ministry; for I am confident that God hath more truth yet to break forth out of his holy word."

We live in a time which finds in this grim and sober past an object, for the most part, of amusement or contempt. There was so much of hardness and sternness in it, so little of playfulness and joy, such a Sabbath view of life, and such a Spartan view of duty, that we rejoice in the era of a softer temper and a kindlier creed. The Pilgrims—as we just now pityingly remem-ber—did not even keep their Christmas Day. Though they well knew all that the season was meaning in the merry England they had left, they shut its festive gratitude out of their hearts; and, as the stern narra-tive says, "Monday, the 25th day, we went on shore, some to fell timber, some to saw, some to rive, and some to carry, so no man rested all that day." And now, with a more generous and a more Christian joy, the Christmas season holds us all in its embrace; and we leave behind us all this Puritan reaction from Pagan observances, as one who hears the solemn curfew change into the merry chime of Christmas bells. And yet what serious observer of the pres-ent time can fail to hear the message which Puritanism has still to give? Is it not plain that the weakness of our age lies just where the Puritan was strong? Is it not true that, while the Puritan method has finally and happily gone, the special perils of American life to-day lie in the threat-ened disappearance from among us of the Puritan spirit? Look for a moment at this greater Puritanism, the unconscious and unintended bequest of that rugged past to the America of to-day, and consider whether it is an inheritance to be despised or lightly thrown away.

First of all, then, the Puritan stood for simplicity. His habit of life was unosten-tatious, thrifty, democratic, plain. "And to-day we have come upon a degree of lux-ury in American life, of vulgar ostentation and tasteless extravagance and competitive foolishness, which have tainted our social life with sensualism, and have become the laughing-stock of the civilized world. I do not dwell on the immorality of this degra-dation of prosperity; for its victims are, for the most part, as much beyond moral argument as the victims of any other epi-demic disease. I only point out that for the social restlessness and threatening dis-content which mark the present time this misuse of prosperity is chiefly responsible. What stirs the poor among us to revolution is not chiefly the fact of wealth: it is the misuse of wealth. It is the shamelessness of luxury and the ostentation of self-indul-gence. To see a man begin life poor and end it rich is not necessarily an exasperat-ing spectacle. It may be regarded by any poor man who has energy and force as an encouraging sign. His, too, are the chances of the world; his, too, the rewards of frugality. But, in a time when any serious person must perceive the gravest possibility of social change, and when the masses of the people are realizing to the full their political power, the chief insti-gator of social revolution, and the element much more dangerous to national peace than any petty group of anarchists, is the idle, spendthrift, insolently worldly class. And no lavishness of almsgiving or ran-som for peace can redeem this situation. The hope of our people lies in some degree of restoration of less material standards and ambitions,—the renewal of simplicity as a principle of social life. Even this happy Christmas time, which seems so much better than any joy the Puritan knew, has become to many a weary home so over-burdened with demands, so commercial in its relations, so showy and excessive in its expressions, that one begins to ask whether we are much better than our forefathers, who used their Christmas, "some to rive, and some to carry, so no man rested all that day." Less festive were they in those harsh winters on that sandy shore; but, at least, they have their message to deliver to this restless time of the simplicity that is in Christ.

There is a second aspect of Puritan char-acter which speaks to the life of to-day. The Puritan was, indeed, severe, unbend-ing, and rigorous; but it was chiefly be-cause one great principle of conduct was with him supreme. It was his loyalty to duty. He knew but one law of life,—the law of righteousness. He had but one au-thority,—his conscience. And now in these softer days, with a less sterile nature and a less rugged creed, the reaction from Puritan duty-doing is in full sway. What is the curse that seems to lie on much of the literature of the present time, much of its drama, much of its poetry? It is the substitution of beauty for duty as the source of power. Nothing seems to these artists so prosaic and jarring as the ethical note. Beauty for beauty's sake; truth—even if it be the nakedest truth—for truth's sake,—that is the shibboleth of realism. Rarely

Chandler & Co.

We invite attention to the superlative quality of all the articles manufactured by

THE DR. JAEGER Sanitary Woollen System Co.

This system of Woollen Underwear and housekeep-ing goods is steadily growing in public favor and is indorsed by leading physicians of this country and Europe. We are Boston Agents for the sale of these goods, and will mail Catalogue upon application.

CHANDLER & CO. Winter Street, Boston.

*Preached in the chapel of Harvard University December 22, 1895 (Forefathers' Day).

enough does literature now take up the martial note of Wordsworth,— “Stern daughter of the voice of God,

O Duty! if that name thou love,
Who art a light to guide, a rod
To check the erring and reprove.”

Rather is it a time when the lighter instincts of literature, as Wordsworth goes on to say,—

“Upon the genial sense of youth rely,
And joy becomes its own security.”

I heard an educated man, a descendant of the Puritans, quoted not long ago as saying that he objected to the use of the word “earnestness” as introducing a false note into literature. An objection to earnestness,—why, that was just what the Cavaliers and the Churchmen of England felt when they encountered the Puritan spirit, and just what drove the Pilgrims from the fleshpots of their Egypt to the wilderness of New England. And what shall we say of this loyalty to conscience in our political world of to-day, and of that political righteousness which the Puritans, like the Hebrews, believed the only thing which exalted a nation? I do not here propose to discuss the political aspects of the solemn crisis into which this country finds itself abruptly plunged. I do not dwell upon the monstrous discord which breaks upon the Christmas note of peace on earth and good will among men in these inflammatory appeals to spurious patriotism. But it is not the political or the commercial or even the bloody possibilities before us which are most startling and ominous. It is the amazing disclosure of the slight activity of the national conscience, and the evidence of a fickle, passionate, irresponsible light-mindedness, which in a vast number of our citizens seems to have usurped its place. Why are the investors of Europe at this moment abandoning business dealings with us? Simply because they cannot trust us, because, instead of a sober and consistent people, they have suddenly discovered us to be variable, excitable, precipitate. Where is to come the lasting humiliation of this week? It is in being forced to acknowledge that in the American character so much remains of the frontier cow-boy, with his hand on his revolver and his tongue provoking to a fight. To be regarded by the nations of the world as unsafe to deal with, as an unstable, fickle-minded, South American kind of republic,—that is a national humiliation. Into the midst of this national light-mindedness, which talks of the inconceivable horrors of war with next of kin as if it were an international sport, comes to-night the grave, self-searching, sober Puritan. The Puritan was not afraid to fight. As he stands here before us, he has his sword girt on his side and his flint-lock is in his hand. But he is afraid to do wrong. He would not dare to fight for any cause that is unjust or superfluous. He is not a free-booter, looking for a chance for glory: he is a good soldier of Jesus Christ, taking orders for a holy war. His commonwealth rests, not on bluster, but on righteousness; and his legislators are chosen under this counsel of John Robinson: “Whereas you are to become a body political, let your wisdom and godliness appear by choosing such persons as do entirely love and will diligently promote the common good. And this duty you may the more willingly and conscionably perform because you are to have those only for governors which yourself shall make choice of for that work.” Do not let us mistake the lesson of the present issue. A country like this is not likely to be taken captive by external foes, but we may as well face the evidence that its permanence is not yet beyond the possibility of disaster. One condition of prosperity no nation is strong enough to defy,—the necessity for soberness, consistency, and self-control. Republics quite as strong as this, in comparison with the powers of their own age, have had their day and have ceased to be. The real perils among us are internal,—a soft theory of life, a limp literature, reckless politics, and conscienceless competition. These are foes which no navy is large enough to repel, and no coast defence strong enough to exclude. The stability of the republic rests just where the Pilgrims planted it, on the rock of a national conscience; and the only secure coast defence is along the line of the stern and rock-bound coast of righteousness.

Finally, the Puritan was sustained in his conquest of a wilderness by an ever-present and intimate sense of the leadership of God. His religion, like that of Israel, was often exclusive, partial, and narrow; but, like that of Israel, it was intense, continuous, and supreme. The principal reason of his great adventure was, as he said, “the great and inward zeal he had of laying some good foundation for the propagating of the kingdom of Christ in these remote parts of the world.” But, in these more favored days, what has become of that living, simple sense of God which guided daily life among our forefathers, as if by a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night? Sometimes one comes out of a frosty night into a genial, firelit room, and his energy slackens as he settles himself into that warmth and peace. Is it not somewhat so that we have come out of the spiritual energy of that frosty past into the genial conditions of the present time? O yes, the Puritan’s faith, like his climate, was harsh; but it was bracing. The Puritan’s God, like his soil, was hard; but, at least, it was a God who made man do his duty when that duty also was hard. The Puritan religion was described some years ago under the title of the “Hard Church”; and it is a great blessing to have emerged from that stern literalism of the lesser Puritanism. But is it not time to face the perils of the “Soft Church,”—the un-vertebrated creed, the molluscos liberalism, which consents to any faith because all faith seems to it unreal? The Soft Church is not promoting free thought, but free thoughtlessness: it stands not for liberty, but for license. It is often very broad, but it is always very thin. Out of the historic past the greater Puritanism recalls us to the stability of character wrought out of responsibility to God. The fear of the Lord is still the beginning of wisdom; and, whatever better things may be prepared for us in these later days, they will slip from our hands, and the nation whose prosperity has been unexampled in the history of the world will forfeit its own mission unless a new degree of soberness and accountability administers its politics and controls its heart.

So, from among the abundant blessings of to-day, we look back to that simple, duty-doing, God-fearing past. There was but one rock in all of Plymouth Bay, and the Pilgrims drew their boat beside it as they possessed the land. We enter more richly into that great possession; but on the rugged boulder of simplicity and duty and faith the feet of those who would hold this heritage must first be set. The Puritan spirit was like one of those bulbs which this country imports, as it did Puritanism, from Holland, in its dull, rough husk, with no perceptible grace or fragrance. Set it, however, in the sun of the later centuries, and that same rough importation blossoms into a flower which would have seemed to the Puritan almost too fair. So the blessings of the present have their root in that sterner past. We do not outgrow the past: we grow out of it. First come the severe virtues of the forefathers; and then, and only then, the softer graces of the modern age. First the lesser Puritanism of form and letter, then the greater Puritanism of spirit and truth. First the primitive college of plain living and high thinking, and then, resting on that precious tradition of simplicity and integrity, the richer learning of the later time. First in a community and in a heart, robust and simple duty-doing, and then the sweeter chimes of the Christmas bells. First the character of those who, not having attained the promise, still died in faith, and then the better things which are prepared for us, that they without us should not be made perfect.

Sermon Cleanings.

A LITTLE CHILD SHALL LEAD THEM.

BY REV. T. D. HOWARD.

The little child, scorned by the proud or deemed beneath notice, appeals to the common heart. Pitying love prompts to the raising of the fallen one because he is fallen: the strong man is moved to defend the weak because he is weak and sorely beset. Those whose home circle is unbroken bring offerings to comfort mourners, because they are bereaved. Would, indeed, that answers to touching appeals were many times multiplied! but the little child is abroad, and enters with quickening ministration many hearts. In the community, be it city, village, or hamlet, illustration is at hand of the child-love’s guidance and of beneficent yielding to its sway.

But still wider is its sphere. It is the hope of those whose organized effort is put forth to promote “peace on earth” that the love of which the little child is the symbol will prevail to the permanent blending in the mutuality of friendly intercourse of the nations of the world. There has been adopted by the French government a resolve in the form of a proposition to be presented to the Congress of the United States. A mutual agreement is by this document proposed, that any difficulty arising between the two countries shall be settled not by an appeal to arms, but by arbitration. This proposition is yet to be acted on by Congress. There is, moreover, no immediate prospect of the need of arbitration. But encouragement is found in the pacific advance made,—the first, I think, which has taken this form. It seems like the revival of the friendship which cheered the birth-time of our republic, of which Lafayette was the embodiment, and the effective co-operation of France the full fruition. The promise it holds forth is of the good time coming, when human love shall be ascendant to the silencing of discord, and nations shall learn war no more.

All this grandly inclusive expanse to which the optimistic eye looks with confident hope is but the enlargement of the sphere of the child-love. I need not say where its primal domain is located. It would be but an old story, coeval with the birth of human history, to tell how the welcome little child leads the father and mother. The attempt would be vain to measure the wealth of love that is born into the home. Paul speaks of the families in heaven and on earth each receiving its name from the Father in heaven. It might be said that the precious gift of God received into parental arms brings the celestial atmosphere into the earthly abode. But its radiation is speedy into sympathetic hearts. The aged Simeon, when he took the child Jesus into his arms, blessed God for the fulfilment of long-cherished expectations. Peaceful hope has been shed abroad in many a spirit whose earthly ties were loosening by the birth of expectant hope.

If hope is encouraged, purity is by the infantine appeal winsomely enjoined. I have read a story of an infant born amid strange surroundings. It was in one of the rude cabins which, with its neighbors, constituted a mining camp. In due time the miners assembled, and the baby was held high before them. There was no noisy demonstration; but there is traced by the writer the thoughts to which in the silence the little child led the men,—thoughts of home long ago left behind, chastened memories which lay in their hearts as a rebuke, and, best of all, love which flowed through channels which had been dry toward the object that typified helpless dependence.

The mother and child! In art this tender relation is idealized, and the affection it shadows forth is sanctified. The mother is the Madonna,—the one among women whom this title of dignity most adequately befits. In the paintings seen in the picture galleries of Europe the Madonna and Child are the oft-repeated subject. The attitude of tenderness in which the mother is represented is the choice of each artist, but the persons are always the same. A not unusual variation is that of the child John standing at the side of the infant Jesus, and holding in his sight a reed cross, as if in reminding prediction. With this exception, only the two figures usually appear. It would seem as if such sameness would become tedious. It has not been found so. Those whose taste is cultivated by viewing the paintings of the old masters seek each new Madonna with fresh interest.

Now the majority of foreign tourists who frequent the picture galleries are Protestant; while this subject, as treated, reflects the doctrines and sentiments of the Roman Catholic Church: the Child is glorified and Mary adored as the Mother of God. But dogmas are lost sight of in the presence of the beauty that glows from the canvas. A rich significance invests the picture of the mother and child,—a profound meaning which rests on the deepest sentiments of the heart. Love is its breathing,—love flowing spontaneously from the mother heart, and returned by the wistful look of the child.

If there is instruction to be drawn from the scene, it comes not to the intellect in the form of a system of theology, but, rather, as the unfolding of the naturalness of religion to the human heart. Each loving mother and trustful child freshly symbolizes the human relationship to the divine. The love, at first only instinctive and without the power of expression in words, grows with the growth and strengthens with the strength. The advance, ideal and replete with beauty, is made concrete in the hymn which traces the growth in grace along with the flower’s expanding, and sings of the infant heart, with influence sweet, “upward drawn to God.”

A few salient touches in the most realistic of the Gospels are made to suffice for the early biography of Jesus. The first describes the scene in the temple at what we should term the christening, when Simeon pronounced his farewell benediction. Again, when the boy was to enter on the period of youth, we see him at the temple, under parental guidance, for sacrificial dedication. Hand in hand with nature still was the spiritual development. And then, for the term of domestic life, there is given a bald summary. But, even in its brevity, the harmonious union of nature and grace has further portrayal: the obligations of the obedient son are conjoined with reverent listening to the voice within his soul: “He came to Nazareth with his parents, and was subject unto them”; and “Jesus increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and men.” May we not say that the life-story was so told that it might be in touch at vital points with our lives, its initiation being in the love that beams from the childhood of Jesus?

UNION OF YOUNG PEOPLE.

One of the most important features of the Conference at Washington was the agitation with regard to a combination of young people’s societies. Also, beyond that, the creation of new ones in which the chief motive should be of a religious nature. Two or three public meetings were held where expression was given as to details. To the main purpose no one seemed to have any opposition. The chief discussion arose as to a title and what it implied. Some were opposed to any name which would keep out individuals not desiring affiliation with distinct Unitarian movements. Certain tentative plans were offered, in order to concentrate matters and economize time. It was finally voted at a public meeting in Metzerott Hall that the general committee should act upon the suggestions read, with full powers, the chief duty of the said committee being to present an appeal to the churches, with the view of having a final settlement on Anniversary Week in Boston.

This committee, into whose hands the matter was placed, consisted of the presidents of the Unity Clubs, Guilds, Unitarian Sunday School Society, Western Sunday School Society, Unitarian Temperance Society and two or three others, representing the East and West in many respects. This committee was considered satisfactory in its elements, and had held a good many previous meetings in Boston to talk over the whole subject. The members were therefore deemed especially qualified to mature some proposition for the consideration of the churches.

Accordingly, this committee, acting upon the vote authorizing them to proceed, and keeping in view the different expressions at the public meetings, met, and subdivided their work. It was first determined that as a provisional name the title “Unitarian

925
1000

Is the Standard
for Silver Ware.

ELECTRO-SILICON

Is the Standard for Silver Polish.

Both stand for perfection.
Grocers sell it.
It's unlike others.

Try quantity for the asking.
Box post-paid, 15 cents.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

Union of Young People's Religious Societies" should be used on the circulars. It was necessary that there should be some heading and identity even in the preparatory stages, which could be set aside, if necessary, on Anniversary Week. This movement is the outcome of a wide desire. All earnest workers in our Unitarian churches seem anxious to bring this union about. If there are any differences, they are over titles or minor matters. Rev. Thomas Van Ness is chairman of the general committee, and also chairman of the sub-committee to prepare a constitution and form for the national organization. He will also take in hand the general correspondence. There is another sub-committee of the general one, selected to assist the churches in their local work of organizing or reconstructing. This last sub-committee, in obedience to its instructions, has prepared a circular which has been sent to every minister in the denomination. We give it below. It is earnestly hoped that this appeal will be attended to rapidly and widely. Already reports have been sent in of movements in this direction. It will be noticed that accompanying the circular were certain suggestions as to different methods of forming new societies. These "suggestions" will be sent by mail to any one applying to Mr. Horton, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, chairman of the sub-committee.

UNITARIAN UNION OF YOUNG PEOPLE'S RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

At the Conference in Washington, in October, several meetings were held to consider the creation of an organization which should include all the young people's societies now existing, and also encourage the establishment of new ones. As a provisional name, the title "Unitarian Union of Young People's Religious Societies" was accepted. A final choice of name will be made when matters are more matured. The time is certainly at hand when the question is pressed home upon our denomination, "What shall we do with our young people?" Good work has been done by the Guilds, Unity Clubs, Fraternities, Lend a Hand Clubs, and similar movements. There is lacking, however, a common ground of action and a general spirit of enthusiasm. Our forces are scattered. Our results are not in proportion to the size of our efforts.

Believing that it is possible to make a great improvement in this condition of things, a committee was chosen at Washington to send out an appeal to the churches of our denomination. We submit to you the necessity of acting in this direction. First, if there is no young people's organization in your church, will you not take steps at once to organize one? Second, if something already exists, will you not indicate your willingness to join this larger organization which we now propose.

With regard to the first suggestion the aim should be to make religion the leading consideration. The society should be avowedly a religious society for the young, with some simple order of opening and closing the services, though the objects considered at the meetings may be purely literary or scientific or philanthropic. The purpose is not so much to talk about religion as to gather in the name and spirit of religion for mutual interchange of thoughts and feelings on such topics as touch the life of the young. Everything should converge on the double purpose of maturing character and strengthening the church. As to the second suggestion, there will be no need of abolishing the names and characteristics of the organizations already existing. If you have some young people's society bearing a name which you wish to preserve, keep it. Simply indicate your willingness to join the national body. You will then be the "_____ of the Unitarian Union of Young People's Religious Societies."

A statement is to be made on Anniversary Week in Boston from a committee appointed by the Guilds and Unity Clubs. It is desirable that the committee appointed at Washington and indorsed by the National Conferences should have something to report before that time. Action cannot be taken on Anniversary Week unless sufficient returns have been made to show what is desired on the part of our churches.

In conclusion, we beg leave to say that, in our judgment, this is one of the most important movements which our denomination has seen. If the opportunity is improved, we shall gain greatly in church life and denominational vigor. We can in this way keep our young people, gain others, train them all in the belief and traditions of our own faith, and in manifold ways increase the strength, numbers, and extension of our cause.

Accompanying this circular are some hints as to the best methods of forming new societies.

EDWARD A. HORTON,
GEORGE W. STONE,
ALLEN W. GOULD,
Sub-Committee.

Now is the time for action. The desires and needs of our churches with regard to the young people ought to take helpful and permanent form. This can be done with perfect adjustment of part to part, and with the preservation of freedom in the different churches. Let it be remembered that, so far as the details of this organization are concerned, they are open for full and free consideration at the meeting on Anniversary Week in Boston. Meanwhile, on the essentials, let every one go forward.

Literature.

DR. REYNOLDS'S BOOK.*

It was Dr. Reynolds's desire and intention to make such a collection of his historical papers as we have here, and the filial piety which has done for him what he could not do for himself deserves and will receive the gratitude of many friends who prized his living strength and would fain do what they can to keep his memory green. Posthumous publication is too frequently a painful comment on the ability of the deceased, for any one to enter on it rashly or unadvisedly. Mrs. Keyes has not done so. To what extent her father's own judgment guided her she does not say; but, certainly, she has not erred upon the side of a too liberal inclusion. In a brief introduction Hon. George F. Hoar expresses the opinion that his taste and capacity for historical investigation, together with his admirable style, "would have enabled him to gain great distinction in that department of literature if he could have devoted his life to it." This estimate is well advised. It is impossible to read the four papers on different subjects of American history without feeling very sure that it does not exceed the truth. They have the qualities of patience, fairness, and lucidity to an eminent degree. There is the general view, without which history becomes a mass of wearisome details. Moreover, it is a general view developed from the facts in hand, and not a foregone conclusion subordinating them to its eager stress. It will be nothing strange if many, reading these papers and afterward the sermons which conclude the volume, find themselves wondering if the work of his vocation was not inferior to that of his avocation in its general effectiveness. If he had given himself up entirely to history, he would have been one of the readable historians, not one of the Dryasdusts who can commend themselves only to a narrow circle to whom the dullest books are by that sign the best. If Judge Hoar had not followed Dr. Reynolds so soon "into the silent land," the task his brother has discharged so pleasantly would probably have fallen to him; and in that case the shading of some things would have been a little different. Dr. Reynolds's Unitarianism was somewhat less traditional than we should gather from Senator Hoar's expressions. It was never stationary, and its detachment from the supernaturalist theory of Christianity was complete before his death. If "scepticism was not congenial to him," neither was it a stranger to his mind, nor his faith such as had not looked it fairly in the face. He held no opinion as a dogma, but every opinion as a rational achievement. And, if "he cared little for discussing questions about which Christians differ," he cared very much to make his own meaning plain, and to distinguish his beliefs as differing widely from those of the orthodox majority. A "mush of concession" was as little to his taste as to any man's that could be named.

Senator Hoar has recently put himself on record as caring more for his antiquarian society than for anything else; and, therefore, his appreciation of Dr. Reynolds's enthusiasm for the history and antiquities of Concord is only what we should expect. His identification of himself with the local sentiment and tradition was as vivid and complete as that of any one to the manner born. Senator Hoar's judgment that "he probably knew more about the town than any other person" is a remarkable testimony, if it is not excessive, when we consider what well-informed persons it brings into comparison with him.

*A COLLECTION OF HISTORICAL AND OTHER PAPERS. By Rev. Grindall Reynolds, D.D. To which are added seven of his sermons. Published by the Editor, Concord, Mass.

There are five papers in this volume that have Concord for their theme in one aspect or another of its important history. They are of much more than local interest. There are two on the history of the First Parish in Concord, which will be serviceable memoirs for those who are studying the religious life of New England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. "The Story of a Concord Farm and its Owners" is, we trust, uncommon in its exhibition of the instability of ownership. For the hard facts of the Concord fight, "touched with emotion," the chapter on that great event is probably unique; but even more interesting, because dealing with an obscure passage in our history, is the paper on "Concord during the Shays Rebellion." Of the more general historical papers, that on "King Philip's War" contends that it was much less deliberately planned than we have generally conceived. That entitled "From Ticonderoga to Saratoga" brings out the fact that "the campaigns of 1775, 1776, and 1777, found the Canadas disposed to rebel, and left them glad to be loyal," and shows why it was so.

Six "Miscellaneous Papers" are given, the most entertaining of which is "Saints who have had Bodies." This was, I think, originally a counterblast to some depreciation of the physical health of men given up to intellectual pursuits. "The Memoir of Grindall Reynolds, Sr.," is all the more interesting because of the light it throws on Dr. Reynolds's antecedents. If my arithmetic does not miscarry, the lives of father and son covered one hundred and thirty-nine years,—1755-1894,—a period of remarkable length for two generations. The father was sixty-seven when the son was born. "Our Bedouins: What can we Do with them?" demands justice for the Indians without even verging on a sentimental misinterpretation of the facts.

Of the seven sermons that have been selected, four or five were probably taken in deference to a tradition of their effectiveness, which is easily understood, especially when we put the man behind the words. One might go far and long, and not find a better statement of our Unitarian development than in "The Sermon at Baltimore, Oct. 29, 1893," or a more impressive statement of "The Power of Jesus' Life" than that which brings the handsome volume to an end.

J. W. C.

DOROTHY, AND OTHER STORIES. By Constance Fenimore Woolson. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Those who thought, when "The Front Yard" was published a few months ago, that it was the last precious legacy we should receive from Miss Woolson's spiritual estate, will be much pleased to get the present volume from her publishers, and all the more because only one of the stories has been published heretofore,—"A Florentine Experiment." The others now appear for the first time; and they have not only the advantage of greater freshness as compared with those of the last volume, but also that of dealing more largely with American situations, where the genius of Miss Woolson was most at home, and of being of a more cheerful strain than that. Regret as we may the withdrawal of a gift so fine, we have every reason to be grateful that it was exercised so long and with so much sincerity.

THAT DOME OF AIR: THOUGHTS ON POETRY AND THE POETS. By John Vance Cheney. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Mr. Cheney might just as appropriately have named his book by another phrase in the same with "that dome of air." He might have called it "That Sunny Dome," for it is a very sunny book. The plea in his first chapter for making religion a matter of poetry rather than a matter of science or theology is well worth considering. Then follow chapters on Emerson, Lowell, Whittier, Longfellow, Bryant, and others, all admirably conceived, with much excellent criticism and a cento of liberal quotations that give the book much additional value, especially as they refresh one's memory of many precious things. On the whole, this is a delightful book for those who love the poets. For others it has no message.

ESSIE: A ROMANCE IN RHYME. By Laura Dayton Fessenden. Illustrated by J. H. Vanderpoel. Boston: Lee & Shepard.—Reduced to prose, this novelette would not be much; and the additional attraction of imperfect rhyme is not such as to recommend it to the reader of good taste and feeling. The mechanism of the verse is sadly out of joint, and "Daisy Miller" is nowhere in comparison with this American girl abroad for rattling slanginess. There is certainly some brightness in the progress of the adventurous maid; but those who are most likely to read it are those whom it is least likely to profit. The Times announcement of the wedding caps the climax of the pervasive unreality.

BROKEN NOTES FROM A GRAY NUNNERY. By July Sherman Hallock. Boston: Lee & Shepard, Publishers, 10 Milk Street.—The title of this book, taken literally, would be misleading; for it is no voice from the convent, but comes from a woman who, with a companion, spent

Blasé Billy

A New Story by Jerome K. Jerome

The first of six short "Stories of the Town" by Mr. Jerome, is in the January issue of

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 cents on all News-stands

The Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia

COPYRIGHT, 1896, BY THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

a year in an old country home. The notes, instead of having the air of the cloister, are full of real life. The writer has the eye to see, the heart to feel, and the mind to interpret the scenes in which she lives. The book is also illustrated by many half-tone vignettes scattered through its pages.

NYMPHS, NIXIES, AND NAIADS: LEGENDS OF THE RHINE. By M. A. B. Evans. With Illustrations by W. A. McCullough. G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The alliterative title of Mr. Evans's book is a warning on the threshold not to expect much in the house, and there is no happy disappointment. The handling of the old legends is not felicitous, and the quality of the verse is very bad indeed. The illustrations, however, are extremely good; and the book is so pretty that one cannot but regret that the poetry is not equal to its several accessories.

TWO COLLEGE BOYS. By Rev. Edward A. Rand. New York: Thomas Whittaker. 75 cents.—A college story without the real flavor of student life will not appeal to the average boy, nor do the glimpses of a camp in the White Mountains atone for its lack. We are told that the good boy of the story is attractive, but we are not greatly impressed by his personality. The bad boy is uninteresting, but is early disposed of. The pleasantest feature of the book is the friendship between Robert Merry and his father.

HEART OF OAK BOOKS. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co.—We have seen no books for children more satisfactory in scope and achievement than these six volumes, which furnish in themselves a library of the best literature for young people. Even the rhymes and jingles show careful selection, and the more advanced books are directly adapted to encourage a love for good reading and assist in the cultivation of taste and imagination. The books are substantially bound in dark red linen.

THE BOY SOLDIERS OF 1812. By Everett T. Tomlinson. Boston: Lee & Shepard, Publishers, 10 Milk Street.—This volume is one of the "War of 1812 Series," and the story is told with spirit and is true to the facts. It deals with a period when the patriotism of the people blazed out with great intensity, and led to many acts of personal courage and heroism.

THE SKETCH BOOK. By Washington Irving. Edited by W. L. Phelps. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—This "Student's Edition" is quite as well adapted for use in homes as in schools. The large print, copious notes, and carefully prepared introduction make this edition of the ever-charming collection of sketches just the thing for the family. Price $1.

THE WATCH FIRES OF '76. By Samuel Adams Drake. Illustrated. Boston: Lee & Shepard, Publishers, 10 Milk Street.—The incidents and deeds of the early heroes of the war for independence are told in this volume with that liveliness of style and accuracy of detail which mark the writings of the author.

Recent Poetry.

"Fact and Fancy: Humorous Poems," by Cupid Jones, is a large and handsome volume, the contents of which do not go far to justify its beautiful appearance. "Cupid Jones" is the pseudonym of Mr. F. H. Saltus, whose picture fronting the title-page is that of a pretty girl with a mustache. It must have been taken some years ago, for Mr. Saltus was born in 1849. His wit is such that, if it could have been married with a good heart and good taste,—a polygamous arrangement against which in this order of existence there is no law,—the children born to it might have been most presentable. As it is, they are ill-mannered, mordant, and in subject and treatment often in bad, sometimes in execrable, taste. We cannot help wondering that a volume of moral coinage so debased and counterfeit should have been put in circulation by so reputable a house as that of G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Miscellaneous.

In the series of "Eclectic School Readings," published by the American Book Company, are two new readers for the first and second grade respectively,—the one containing short stories, well adapted for interesting the little beginners, the other given up to fairy-stories, many of them already familiar, and none the worse on that account.

The bound volume of Harper's Young People opens so freely and lies so flat on the table that its bulk will be less of an obstacle in the way of enjoying it than one would think at first. It contains a variety of serials, short stories, anecdotes, instructive articles, athletic advice and information, and other matter of interest to young people, with whom this magazine has long been a favorite.

Two small but choice volumes of selections from the poetry of Alfred Tennyson appear as "Locksley Hall, and Other Poems," and "A Dream of Fair Women, and Other Poems," published by Macmillan & Co., and sold for forty-five cents each. These pocket editions are invariably popular, offering, as they do, something one is really glad to own at a small price.

Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe" is published as a quadruple number of the "Riverside Literature Series," and ought to receive honored place in the libraries of all our boys and girls. It is supplied with biographical sketch and notes, which fits it especially for the use of students, though this is one of the books which need no promotion to the list of college admission requirements to bring it to notice. The brown linen covers of this series are especially serviceable and attractive.

Every one who knows German literature at all has heard of Von Scheffel's "Eckehard," which has passed through one hundred and thirty-eight editions in the original. The present translation, published by T. Y. Crowell & Co., is practically made over by Nathan Haskell Dole, and has been enriched by the notes of the recent German edition and by a series of illustrations by German artists. In its gilt-embellished covers the two volumes have rather a foreign appearance. The price is $2.

The best to-day is not too good for the children. Once it was supposed that anybody could teach a child: now we find that it requires not only a special genius, but the most thorough study and preparation. Froebel was the prophet of the new dispensation; and to-day he has a large number of disciples, and among them are Kate Douglas Wiggin and Nora Archibald Smith, who are preparing three volumes entitled "The Republic of Childhood." They are the outcomes of talks and conferences on Froebel's educational principles for the last fifteen years. They are a combination of theoretical principles with practical experiences. The first volume has just been issued by Messrs Houghton, Mifflin & Co., entitled "Froebel's Gifts." The book will be cordially welcomed by kindergartners.

The Magazines.

The two handsome volumes which appear as Scribner's Magazine in bound form please the eye and taste of the book-lover as much as they tempt his closer acquaintance with the contents. There are many articles between these covers which are well worth rereading, even by those who have followed the magazine through the year.

The American Health Club is to have a new means of expressing its principles by the magazine recently started under the editorial management of T. A. Bland and M. Cora Bland. It aims to be a magazine of practical information for the people. The first number contains a talk on "How to cure Dyspepsia," hints on the value of deep breathing, the relative value of foods, and other matters of interest.

The Harvard Graduates' Magazine continues to prove itself a necessity for those who wish to keep fairly in touch with the university life. It reprints in this number the much quoted words spoken at the last Commencement dinner of the Alumni by George A. Gordon, and also the address of last Memorial Day delivered by Judge Holmes. I. N. Hollis contributes a study of the Lawrence Scientific School, Barrett Wendell continues the series of articles on historical portraits in the college collection, with a description of Nicholas Boylston and his successors in the professorship that bears his name, and Prof. Hart explains "Harvard's Athletic Policy." There are the usual departments and interesting class news.

Literary Notes.

Rev. William Bayard Hale has written a suggestive paper for the January Forum, entitled "A Study of Church Entertainments."

J. M. Barrie was four years writing the serial "Sentimental Tommy," which is begun in the January Scribner. The scene of the tale moves from the East End of London to Thrums.

The Outlook is to issue monthly a magazine number. This for December contains an interesting autobiographical article by Edward Everett Hale, which is supplemented by several pictures. Ian Maclaren contributes a Drumtochty story, and there are other features which are valuable in themselves and suggestive of more good things to come.

St. Nicholas Magazine recently offered prizes for the best corrections of a misspelled poem. More than ten thousand answers were received; and the committee has been overwhelmed with work, the results of which and the names of the prize-winners will appear in the January St. Nicholas. Answers came from all over the world,—from Turkey, from Egypt, and from Europe, from a little countess in Vienna, and from the grandchildren of Emerson and Hawthorne in America. The committee reluctantly make the admission that the penmanship of the English and Canadian children excels that of Uncle Sam's boys and girls.

France, Scotland, England, Japan, and the United States are represented by the writers of the five articles in the January number of the International Journal of Ethics. The main articles are: "The Hegemony of Science and Philosophy," Alfred Fouillée, Institute of France; "Social Evolution," D. G. Ritchie, University of St. Andrews, Scotland; "The Ethical Life and Conceptions of the Japanese," Tokiwo Yokoi, Tokyo, Japan; "The Social Question in the Catholic Congress," John Graham Brooks, Cambridge, Mass.; "National Prejudices," John Code Bayly, London. The article by Prof. William James in the October number (Vol. VI., No. 1) on "Is Life Worth Living?" is discussed by Thomas Davidson and Prof. J. Arthur Thomson.

Books Received.

From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. Sir Walter Scott's Ivanhoe. 80 cents. Uncle Tom's Cabin; or, Life among the Lowly. By Harriet Beecher Stowe. 80 cents. From D. C. Heath & Co., Boston. The Heart of Oak Books. Edited by Charles Elliot Norton. Six books. From the Boston Book Company, Boston, Mass. Commentaries of the Constitution of the United States. Historical and Juridical. By Roger Foster, of the New York Bar. Vol. I. From Ginn & Co., Boston. Studies in the Science of Drawing in Art. By Aimée Osborne Moore. From A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago. A Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life. By Thomas Jay Hudson. $1.50. From the Sigma Publishing Company, Chicago, Ill. In Story-land. By Elizabeth Harrison, Principal of the Chicago Kindergarten College. From the Student Publishing Company, Hartford, Conn. The Stars of God. By E. Fitch Burr, D.D., LL.D. From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Scribner's Magazine. Two volumes, January-June and July-December, 1895. From Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. Toxin. A Story of Venice. By Ouida. Illustrated by Louise L. Heustis. From Macmillan & Co., New York. The Poetical Works of Alfred Lord Tennyson. Locksley Hall, and Other Poems. The Poetical Works of Alfred Lord Tennyson. A Dream of Fair Women, and Other Poems.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. There is Rest. Duet for Soprano and Alto or Tenor and Alto. By Augusto Rotoli. Veni Creator. Sacred Song. For Baritone in G. By Alois Bartschmidt. A Lamb of God. Sacred Song. For Alto or Baritone in D-flat. By Th. Brackley. There is an Hour of Hallowed Peace. Sacred Song for Alto or Baritone in E-flat. By C. Cheney. Sparkling Eyes of Blue. Song with Waltz Chorus. By J. W. Wheeler. Words by Winnifred B. Vickerson. Only a Little Dearly Dirl. Words and music by Addison F. Andrews. McNally's Family Band. Song and chorus. Written and composed by Miles F. Jordan. If you love me, tell me so. Song and Waltz Refrain. Music by Eduard Holst. Words by Alfred Hoover.

Gift Books.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."

Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages. "One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages. "There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages. "Rev. Marion D. Shutter is well known as an essayist and thinker of exceptional ability. This little volume ought to be in the hands of every parent and teacher, as Dr. Shutter has grasped in a notable way the soul of the new educational methods, and in these five chapters he employs them in a most striking manner."—The Arena.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents. Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

 For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,

174 High Street. - - - Boston.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT IN NEW YORK With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs. Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott. A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. 86th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed it." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $5.00 to $100.00 a month. Free We Pay Freights to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Outfit. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics.

BY

THOMAS HILL, D.D., LL.D.

Contents:

PART I., POSTULATES OF REVELATION.—I. The Unseen Real; II. The Reality of Knowledge; III. The Infinite Knowable; IV. Final Causes; V. The Universe a Work of Art; VI. Power and Possibility; VII. Logic and Love; VIII. Beauty; IX. The Testimony of Conscience; X. The Infinite in Man; XI. Relativity and Reality; XII. The Universe a Revelation; XIII. Authority and Inspiration; XIV. Summary of Natural Sources of Religious Knowledge.

PART II., POSTULATES OF ETHICS.—I. The Field of Ethics; II. The Validity of Moral Perceptions; III. The Nature of Ethical Relations; IV. The Innocence and Sinfulness of Error; V. Love and Duty; VI. Determinism and Utility; VII. Duties Relative to Self; VIII. The Connection of Ethics with Religion; IX. Non-religious Morals and Moralists; X. Learning by Doing.

394 pages, with portrait, price $1.50.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE YEAR BOOK

OF THE

Unitarian Congregational Churches

FOR 1896

will be published December 24, in season to reach those ordering it by the beginning of the new year, all lists being corrected as nearly as possible to that date.

Besides a calendar adapted for use throughout the country, and other matter belonging to an almanac, it contains lists of societies, ministers, associations, and conferences, and other important denominational information.

Price 20 cents, for which it will be sent to any address, postage paid. Packages of ten or more, 15 cents a copy. Members of the Association receive a copy without charge.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,

25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Croswell Cressey, Ph.D.

In "The Essential Man" Dr. Cressey has given an interesting and profitable study of a problem which can never grow old as long as man is what he is. . . . This little volume is thoroughly modern in tone, absolutely clear, free from either traditionalism or sentimentality, and brings out better than any work of the same size which we know the fundamental facts disclosed by the modern study of mind and nature which lead to a rational assurance of a life to come. If one wished simply to sharpen his own philosophical thinking, he could hardly do better than to test it by the clear propositions of this book.—The Hartford Seminary Record.

It is a healthful and helpful book which no one can read without profit.—The New World.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.

If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Home.

ONE MOTHER.

Hundreds of stars in the pretty sky,
Hundreds of shells on the shore together,
Hundreds of birds that go singing by,
Hundreds of bees in sunny weather.

Hundreds of dewdrops to greet the dawn,
Hundreds of lambs in the purple clover,
Hundreds of butterflies on the lawn,
But only one mother the wide world over!

—Exchange.

For the Christian Register.

PRINCE BLADUD.

STORY OF A LONG-AGO CHRISTMAS.

BY FRED MYRON COLBY.

"Come, uncle, won't you tell me a story?" asked little Guy Leavitt one evening just before Christmas.

Uncle Paul laid down his Scientific American with a sigh, and, taking off his spectacles, looked at his nephew benevolently.

"Well, what shall I tell you about?" he kindly asked.

"Oh, anything: only I want it to be true, and there must be a real, live prince in it," said Guy.

"I would not tell him another story, Uncle Paul," interposed his sister Edna. "He has been hid away all day, reading the story of 'Beauty and the Beast.'"

"I thought you said, Guy, that you were going to study your history more and read less of fiction," observed Uncle Paul.

"But it is so tedious, uncle; and I can't find just what I wish to. I had much rather listen to you."

"Oh, what teases boys are!" cried Edna. "I should think Uncle Paul would get tired of you." Saying which, she swept out of the sitting-room, humming the gay air of a waltz she had recently heard.

"Don't mind anything about her, Guy," said Uncle Paul, as he marked the boy's reddening cheeks, "and I will tell you a Christmas story."

"A Christmas story!" echoed Guy, disappointedly. "I don't believe I shall like that. There's a lot of them in my new magazine, but I haven't read one of them. They are all about old apple-women or birds getting lost in the snow,—just right for girls."

"Nevertheless, I shall tell you a Christmas story; and there will be a prince in it, too," continued Uncle Paul, quietly. "And now, first of all, you must know that the twenty-fifth day of December was celebrated as a holiday long before Christ was born. Our British forefathers, when they were heathen, honored the day much after the same fashion as we do now. They called it 'yule-tide' in those days, after one of their false gods; and the oak, the pine, and the mistletoe were sacred to it. Finally, when they were converted to Christianity, they showed their respect for the old religion by attaching many of its rites and ceremonies to the new, so that really the Christmas that we honor with such festivities to-day is as much an ancient heathen memorial as it is a Christian one. Still, none of us have in our minds any thought of the fierce, bloody gods of our far-distant ancestors when we eat our annual Christmas goose or put our presents on the evergreen for you and Edna."

"The story I have in mind, however, goes back beyond the time when England was Christianized. It was in pagan Britain, three hundred years before the Saviour was born. Very different was the country then from the England of to-day. The great city of London, with its vast population, its culture, its wealth, was then unbuilt. No great fleets came sailing up the Thames. No church bells rang in the valleys; no castles towered on the hills. For those were years long before the flash of Roman spears or the sound of Saxon horns were seen or heard in the green, beautiful isle of the Northern Sea. Magnificent forests clothed the land, among which lived half-barbarous tribes, who subsisted by hunting and cultivating the ground in their rude way."

"The king of one of these tribes was Lud Hurdebras. His queen was named Nowa. Their only child was Prince Bladud; and at the time we speak of he was about fourteen years old, a manly little fellow for his age. His bold step, his air of dignity, marked him noble by birth,—the son of a warlike chief."

"Unfortunately, however, young Bladud was attacked by that loathsome disease called the leprosy. This malady is very common among uncivilized peoples; and, as it was infectious and considered incurable, whoever was afflicted with it was compelled to leave the habitations of men and wander into the forests and deserts, to take care of himself as best he might. Nor were princes excepted in this rigorous treatment; and so, when it became known that Bladud was a leper, the chiefs and elders of the kingdom decided that he must leave the royal city and go forth a wanderer."

"Oh!" exclaimed Guy, with a little shudder: "that was cruel!"

"No doubt the little prince thought as you do, but he had to submit. King Hurdebras and his mother were loath to part with their child of whom they had been so proud. The queen, Nowa, slipped a ring into his hand, telling him to wear it for her sake, and, if ever he was cured of his leprosy, to bring it back to her; for by that token she should know him, though years should change him to a man, since there was no other ring like it. With this ring in his bosom, and still wearing the garments brightly stained with figures, which denoted his royal birth, the unlucky young prince left the palace to wander out into the world alone."

"It was in the spring-time of the year, when Nature wore her loveliest hues, that Prince Bladud, his eyes full of tears, set out on his hopeless journey. He travelled many weary days before he met with any one who showed him compassion. At last, nearly exhausted with hunger and fatigue, his painted garments travel-stained and worn, he reached the hut of a peasant, who took pity on the royal youth, without, however, being conscious of the rank of his visitor. With this man he secured a situation as a swineherd, an employment the meanest and humblest in the rude society of that day."

"Bladud, metamorphosed into a swineherd, did not much resemble the princely youth who had been petted by the chieftains in the royal palace of Lud Hurdebras. For the royal robes, dyed after the fashion of the Britons to show his station, were substituted undressed sheepskins from which the wool had been shorn. His bed was a couch of rushes. His food was of the coarsest kind, consisting of black, unleavened cakes and roasted nuts and acorns; and he was obliged to be in the fields all day with his porcine charge. Still, with all these hardships and discomforts, he found that he enjoyed life better than when he had lived in a palace; and, indeed he would have been quite happy, could he have seen his father and mother now and then."

"He was troubled, however, with one anxiety. He noticed that several of his master's pigs were infected with his disease; and this, he feared, would draw upon him the displeasure of the old peasant. But, fortunately, leprosy and its contagious nature were unknown among the simple people of that remote section. Besides, the old man was nearly blind, and, convinced of the faithfulness of his servant, left the swine entirely to his management. Bladud's misfortune was, therefore, undetected; yet he sincerely lamented being the innocent cause of bringing the sore disease upon his master's property."

"Bladud often led his grunting charge a week's journey from the hut he called his home; and, as the season grew late, he went deeper and deeper into the forests. One day he saw the bright waters of the river Avon sparkling before him in the glow of the morning sun. On the opposite banks grew noble oaks, and the red acorns covered the ground,—an ample feast for his herd of swine. He crossed the stream at a shallow spot, which to-day, in memory thereof, is still called 'Swinford,' or 'Swine's Ford.' But what was his surprise, on arriving at the further bank, to see his charge scamper away, as though seized by a sudden frenzy. Upon following them, he found they were wallowing in a low swamp, where there were some springs of water which oozed out of the boggy land. All his efforts to drive them from the bog were unavailing; and, after a while, the youth, naturally thoughtful and observant, began to think there must be good reason for their action, and determined to watch the cause and effect."

"I guess it was witches' work," said Guy, considerably interested.

"You must discard such ideas, Guy," replied his uncle, with a grave smile. "There never was a witch like those you read of in fairy stories. It was a natural instinct that guided the swine; for, unknown to Bladud, this spot was remarkable for its natural peculiarities, being nothing less than those medicinal springs of Bath, whose properties are beneficial for certain diseases to the present day. He soon noticed, however, that the diseased swine were improving in their appearance; and, after a week or two, he saw that all the leprosy signs had left them."

"Who can imagine Bladud's feelings when the thought presented itself that he, too, could be cured by similar treatment? In his fond hopes he was not disappointed. He took daily baths in the bubbling springs, and had the satisfaction at last of perceiving by the clear mirror of the stream that his skin, once blotched, was now smooth and ruddy again with health."

"All the boy's thoughts were now of home. Pressing the agate ring, his mother's gift, to his bosom, he guided his herd homeward. To his master he told his story,—how he had been driven from a palace to take shelter in the wilderness on account of his leprosy, and how that now he was cured."

"And who art thou?" asked the wondering old man.

"I am Bladud, the son of thy king," answered the youth. "Go with me to the court of Lud Hurdebras, and thou shalt be well rewarded for thy kindness to a prince."

"It was the time of the great festival of Yule, and they found all the court celebrating the occasion. The king's palace, which was a very rude affair compared even with our poorest comfortable modern dwellings, was everywhere decorated with the sacred mistletoe. The minstrels were singing songs. The Druid priests, in their long white robes, were offering sacrifice; and Bladud saw his father and mother standing at a long table spread with bounteous cheer, while a crowd stood about them. Watching his chance, the prince stole slyly up and dropped his ring into the queen's goblet, unperceived. He knew that she would recognize the ring, though she would not know him, clad as he was in his rough swineherd's clothes. She did recognize the ring, and then Bladud knelt at her feet. Sunburned and weather-beaten, taller than when he had left her, and wearing the indigent garb of a laborer, she did not know him at first; but, when he spoke, she clasped him to her breast, exclaiming, 'My son! my son!'"

"It was not long before the king and the whole court knew that Bladud had returned, and was cured of his leprosy. There was rejoicing that night such as was seldom witnessed in the royal palace. Oxen and swine were slaughtered, the harpers sounded their loudest strains, and there was dancing and revelling till a late hour. It was the happiest Yule-tide in all King Hurdebras's life."

"O uncle, you haven't finished, have you?" cried Guy, regretfully. "I am not the least bit tired yet."

"There is not much more to tell you," concluded Uncle Paul. "Prince Bladud lived to succeed his father, and he reigned prosperously for many years. He founded a city near the springs whose healing waters had restored him to health, and a kingdom; and in many other beneficent ways he civilized his country. When you grow older, you can read a very fine tragedy by the great poet, Shakspeare, called 'King Lear,' which character you will perhaps be glad to know was the son of our Prince Bladud."

For the Christian Register.

THAT BLESSED OLD OAT.

BY SYDNEY DAYRE.

"It's my belief that woman's in want, or next door to it."

"You don't say!"

Mrs. Marshall, Miss Pringle's next-door neighbor, who had dropped in for a friendly chat, gazed with interest at the pretty cottage across the way.

"Yes, I do." The genial old maid drew down the corners of her mouth into an expression as severe as it was possible for her face to put on. "And all because of the hatefulness of that Wright family."

"Now, Barbara!"

"It's so. Don't I know the Wrights as well as I know myself? They never forgave it to her that she married Archibald, she having no money of her own."

"She was plenty good enough for him."

"Too good, to my mind, altogether. Although I don't mean to criticise Archie, poor fellow, now that he's in his grave. He and I were always good friends; and I'd feel a drawing to help his family, even if I didn't feel it for her sake, which I do. And now I'm just as sure as I'm sure I live that she don't know where to look for the next dollar."

"Don't they know it,—the Wrights?"

"They won't know it. They shut their eyes to it. It's my belief they're letting things drag along on purpose,—not settling up the will when they might. Now there,"—Miss Barbara opened her purse and showed a bill,—"there's fifty dollars that I've carried over with me time and again, hoping and watching for some chance of offering it to Mrs. Wright, just for a present accommodation, I'd put it. But, bless your heart, I don't dare. With all her mildness and her dainty prettiness, she's as proud as Lucifer, and as firm as a rock when you get right down to it."

"The Wrights are fond of the children, aren't they?"

"In a way. Send them fiddle-faddle presents, when they don't know whether the poor lambs have enough good food." Miss Barbara sniffed with energy.

"Oh, but they know she wouldn't let them get to that."

"I suppose not," agreed Miss Barbara, with a thread of doubt in her tone.

"And Christmas 'most here," went on Mrs. Marshall, with a voice of distress and a face of dismay.

"Yes," Miss Barbara solemnly chimed in. "And there are people just hard enough to let the blessed Lord's birthday pass without caring to make it a time of happiness to the widow and the orphan. Two years since he died."

"Can't she urge them to a settlement?"

"She won't. She's too proud. And his affairs were so mixed up with theirs I suppose they can do as they please about it."

"Some time in autumn." "By the holidays." Now it was, "Early in the year," in answer to Mrs. Wright's modest requests that some provision for the needs of her children should be made out of their father's estate.

"It won't come in time for Christmas, Felix," she said, folding up the letter, after showing it to her eldest boy. "What are we going to do about it?"

"What are we, mamma?"

The boy turned a pair of sober eyes upon her, not at all in the appealing inquiry of a child, but with the look of one accustomed to share in deliberation on all serious questions.

The twelve-year-old boy had already grown to be his mother's sympathizing counsellor. Far earlier than this in his life his childish observation had recognized the light regard in which his mother, worshipped by him in all the fulness of boyish enthusiasm, was held by her husband's relatives. He resented it loyally, and warmly is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

A Good Almanac

The Sunlight Almanac

for 1896 contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free

to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them.

Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents.

A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 330).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

shared the feeling which led her to avoid any direct appeal for an advance of money to tide over present difficulties. Only Felix shared her knowledge of how pressing were their needs.

"I suppose we might urge the matter a little on your Uncle Marcus."

"I wouldn't," said Felix, bristling. "I'd starve first, mamma."

"We won't go so far as that, dear," she said, smiling. "But there won't be much Christmas for us, you know,—no fine dinner and no toys."

"We'll make our presents, mamma. Lots of the girls and boys do. I know what I can do for Hetty and the boys. And I know,—oh! but I won't tell!"

Clapping his hands upon his mouth, Felix, still unable to hold in the laugh which forced itself along with the host of charming new ideas with which his brain suddenly teemed, rushed away to his sisters.

A great rummaging in the garret followed. The little girls accepted with delight Felix's ideas on the subject of home-made Christmas gifts.

For the week following the cottage was a scene of lively industry. Scraps of silk, lace, and velvet, gum-bottles, paint-boxes, notions of various sorts, were to be found on every hand. Mysteries brooded everywhere. Consultations were held in corners, fingers meaningly laid on lips holding in a smile. The sudden entrance of any one into a room was sure to elicit exclamations of dismay, accompanied by a tumultuous gathering-up of scattered work. Little squeals and jumps would follow the opening of a drawer or the lifting of a lounge pillow.

In short, mother sometimes half wondered if a moneyless Christmas might not have its bright side.

Very near the blessed holiday Miss Pringle dropped in for one of her almost daily visits. Her entrance, as usual, created a small breeze of delight.

"O Miss Barby, just look here!"

"This way first, or some one might see."

"You wouldn't breathe a word!"—

"Mine's finished!"—

"You must come up to my room, and take a peep, Miss Barby."

Miss Barby, as on every day before, gazed and admired and counselled. She basted Hetty's silk patchwork, got the snarl out of Ruth's crochet work, and put some dainty touches to Felix's drawing, all the while being intrusted with the keeping of more secrets than she could ever have thought to tell, even had she been so disposed.

Between times casting looks at mother which mean —

"If only I dared!"

"You haven't heard the bad news yet, though, Miss Barby."

Hetty and Lill drew down their faces, and the twin boys each applied a fist to an eye.

"Bad news. Why, what?"

"Our kitty's gone."

"Dear—me!" The surprise and concern with which the exclamation came were fully satisfactory. "Why? How? When?"

"We haven't seen her since yesterday morning."

"I don't believe we'll ever again see her," said Felix.

"She must 'a' been stole," said one of the twins.

The two little girls gave affectionate sniffs.

"She was such a smart cat that everybody wanted her," said Felix.

Then followed stories, all of which Miss Barbara had heard many times before, all in proof of their cat's phenomenal smartness.

"She always sat on Felix's shoulder at lunch-time."

"But never expected to eat a bit, 'cause she knew it wasn't a cat's place to eat at the table."

"Used to mew at the window to get in, and then go to the door, 'cause she knew somebody'd go to let her in."

"And the way she whirled round when Felix tied a piece of paper to her tail!"

"But," said Lill, a little remorsefully, as all laughed at the remembrance, "I always did think that a little too bad. It used to make her so dizzy."

"Susan believes she's somewhere 'round yet," said Hetty, hopefully. "She puts a saucer of milk for her in the back porch, just as she always did; and she says sometimes it's gone."

"I don't believe it, though," said Lill, with a mournful shake of her head. "Why would she stay away from us if she was anywhere here?"

The atmosphere became so heavy that Miss Pringle sought to lighten it by some new suggestions in regard to the Christmas gifts, with the happy result of sending the small girls up to the garret to seek new supplies of silk scraps.

"What's the matter?"

Mother started to her feet a minute later. Cries and excited movements sounded in the garret, whether belonging with delight or distress could not be determined. The boys rushed up, followed by mother and Miss Pringle.

"Oh! oh! oh! She's found."

"The dear old cat!"—

"And kittens!"

If ever a cat was loaded with caresses and congratulations, it was this particular Maltese, who, now that her charming secret was discovered, made no objection to her treasures being examined and admired.

"Her Christmas present to us!"

"It would be enough if there wasn't to be another one."

Miss Barbara went home still discouraged. She had not seen any opportunity for the carrying out of her daring.

"And yet more than ever I believe that woman hasn't a cent."

It was really almost as she believed. Mother and Felix talked it over after the others had gone to bed, he holding one of her hands, as with the other she smoothed his hair, gazing up into her face with his soft, loving eyes full of wonder if ever before had lived anything so sweet, lovely, and altogether adorable as this little mother of his, one moment with a heart swelling with anger at those who might have made her way smoother and would not, the next softening and warming with the thought of how he, in years to come, would take delight in blessing her life with all which could serve to compensate her for present trials, never dreaming that in his thoughtful affection he was already bringing her richest compensation.

In the discussion on ways and means in which he shared with such pride he yielded with a little sigh to mother's decision.

"It must be one way or the other, my dearie. Either I must send you on the little journey to your uncle's or we must have a plain, every-day dinner for Christmas."

How very plain their every-day dinners had come to be!

"Not even a chicken?" he asked wistfully. "A little bit of a one?"

"Not unless you will go, my little man."

"Do you want me to, mother dearie?" he asked, patting her hands.

"No, I don't, dear boy."

"Then I won't." Felix said it doggedly.

"I'd rather have corned beef and potatoes every day of my life."

"You—don't hear anything lately from Mr. Marcus Wright, I suppose?"

Miss Barbara ventured the question on the occasion of her next visit to Mrs. Wright, it then being the afternoon of Christmas eve.

"No," said Mrs. Wright. "Except," she added, "that I have received a parcel containing gifts to the children. I'll show them to you if you like."

"It was all I could do to contain myself." So Miss Pringle afterward declared to her friend, Mrs. Marshall. "Do you think they took a loving thought of the widow and her children,—of trying to make the blessed season a time of rejoicing for them? Not they! Any one could tell what a swell, purse-proud set those things came from. A grand cut-glass and silver ink-stand for Felix, rich lace handkerchiefs for the little girls, and cuff-buttons for the twins. Not a thing that one of the darlings would care for, and their mother not able to buy them a toy. And, as for their Christmas fare,—well, I can't say."

But at the time Miss Barbara smothered her indignant feelings, and expressed due admiration for the costly gifts. Very soon, however, her attention was claimed by the children, who came to her with an inconsolable wail.

"Kitty's gone again."

"Oh, but you may be sure she'll be found, as she was before."

"But the kittens are gone!"

"H'm! Well, I wouldn't mind that, either. Cats have a way of carrying off and hiding their kittens. They'll turn up again."

She comforted and cheered them to the point of turning their attention to the finishing touches to some of the Christmas gifts.

"I've done all mine except this little thread basket for mother," said Hetty, "and I haven't been able to find anything to line it. There was a bundle of soft silk pieces about, a few days ago; but I can't find them now."

"Didn't I see you putting them into the back hall closet?" asked Lill.

"Oh, so I did. One day when I thought mother was coming, and I was afraid she'd suspect. I'll get them. You can wait, can't you, Miss Barby? I won't be a minute."

It took longer, however, than the little lassie had anticipated to find the pieces. Mother had been "settling" the closet since her hasty throwing in of the bundle of silks. It was a large closet under the stairway, the lower shelves of which ran far back under the slope of the stairs, making them wide and commodious.

As Hetty felt about in the half light, her hand came upon a basket which had been placed there a year before. It was a work-basket, elaborately trimmed with silk and lace and well stocked with everything belonging with a work-basket in silver and finest steel. It had been one of the Christmas gifts to Lill.

"A work-basket, for a bit of a six-year-old!" had been Miss Pringle's silent comment. Mother had put the dainty thing away for future use.

"It must be behind this!"— Hetty gave the basket a jerk toward her. It was heavier than she had expected; and, as it balanced for a moment at the edge of the shelf and then toppled over, she gave a scream,—half of fright, half of amazement, which mingled with a rattle of the various small utensils which had fallen to the floor.

Other things had also fallen.

Hetty had started away on a run, but stopped suddenly.

Miss Pringle was the first to come at the sound of her cry.

"Well, if it isn't!"—

"Those kittens!" screamed Lill.

"Poor little kittens!" Hetty turned to gather them tenderly in her arms.

"Poor Aunt Dorothy's gift!" said mother, stooping over the fallen basket.

"O you naughty old cat, how you have abused it! Look, dears: it is all clawed and torn."

"Well, it's no use fretting over what can't be helped." Miss Pringle had joined the group, and was busy picking up the scattered articles. "Here they all are, just as good as ever; and the basket can be re-covered, when the cat's done with it. Here, Felix, carry them all up, and lay Salt is that nothing, which, if put on anything,

makes it good for something.
Of course we mean Bradley's
"Yorkshire"
Salt
which is the only salt free from lime and dirt, and that won't harden. Your grocer can supply you—see that he does. Write to us for a free sample bag.

We make all kinds and grades of salt. Whatever price you pay, see that you get Bradley's—it will be the best salt made for the money.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,
49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

"A TRAINING IN CLEANLINESS IS A FORTUNE." COMPLETE YOUR EDUCATION WITH SAPOLIO

Fatal
 Pneumonia.

That dreaded disease that temporarily compels a cessation of the work of all the greater organs of the body, thus stopping the digestion of food, the creation of new tissue, brings the patient to a point where the flickering flame of life is blown out like the light of a burnt-out candle. To make recovery probable, keep up the patient's strength—give him that great concentrated essence of the vital principles of lean beef, the strength of which is enhanced by our special cold process method of manufacture, it can be retained by the weakest stomach, and in every instance makes blood, flesh and strength. Dr. Charles Wilson, Atwell Ave., Providence, says; "My wife suffered a severe attack of pneumonia; after passing the acute stage fearing heart failure, I gave her freely Bovinine and port wine, equal parts. I have never seen such good results. I am a hearty believer in Bovinine for quick nutrition." Over 25000 other physicians endorse it equally strong.

Bovinine

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

•CLOCK•

FRENCH TRAVELLING, ENGLISH HALL, GILT AND CRYSTAL.

GUARANTEED TIME-KEEPERS

Bigelow, Kennard & Co.
50 Washington St. cor. West.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.
ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A party of limited numbers will leave Boston Monday, February 24, for a

Grand Tour
—TO—
JAPAN AND CHINA.

The tour through Japan will be much more comprehensive than is usually made, and there will be longer sojourns at all the chief cities and points of interest. In China there will be visits to Hong Kong, Macao, and Canton.

In connection with the foregoing a tour through the HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, with visits to Honolulu, Hilo, the volcano of Kilauea, etc. December 10, January 7 and 23, and on other dates in February and March, Tours to California.

January 15, Special Tour through the Mediterranean Countries.

January 23 and February 13, Tours to Mexico.

March 21, May 16, May 23, June 20, and July 4, Tours to Southern, Central, and Northern Europe.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

them on your mother's bed. Yes, that's all."

"Don't be stooping so, Miss Barby," said mother, in affectionate concern. "Your face is so flushed, and your hands positively trembling. Really, you'll have an attack of headache. Come and sit down."

"I can't wait another minute," said Miss Pringle, as she hurried away.

A few minutes later, as his mother was engaged in sorting the tangle of working implements and materials, Felix heard an excited call.

"My boy, come here! Look!"

Half in and half out of the needle-book was a folded bank-note. Felix drew it out and opened it.

"A fifty-dollar bill!"

"O poor, dear, old Aunt Dorothy," said mother, wiping her eyes. "I thought her gift such a useless one; and now see what a kindly thought she had of helping us! It has lain here all the year. And now I never can thank her."

At about the same time Miss Pringle sat alone in her little parlor, laughing like a girl.

"You did that well, Barbara Pringle. An 'attack,' dear little soul! Yes, not of headache, but of daring. Was ever a happier inspiration than came to me with one hand on that needle-book and in the other that bill that I'd made up my mind I could not bring home again, and Christmas so near? Yes, poor old Miss Dorothy, you are welcome to all the credit of it; and there isn't the slightest danger of any one ever knowing it was not you except myself and that blessed old cat."

For the Christian Register.

THE ECHOES OF A CHANCE REMARK.

BY ALICE W. ROLLINS.

"Christmas?" said Mr. Selwyn at the breakfast-table. "Christmas is giving somebody something you know he doesn't want, in the hope that he will give you something that you do."

He was surprised at not receiving any remonstrance: he had expected an entertaining chorus of rebuke. But there were no reproaches. The Breakfast Table had its own plan for an effective reply. Suddenly Tommy suggested calmly:—

"I believe that is so, papa. If I worry you to death about it till Christmas time, I believe you'll give me that pony just to end the discussion."

"Thomas!" gasped Mr. Selwyn. "That is not—not exactly what I meant."

"But it is what you said, papa,—giving somebody what he doesn't like, so that he will give you something that you do."

No remonstrance which he had ever received had so stunned Mr. Selwyn as this sudden acquiescence on the part of his next-to-the-youngest.

"That—that was only intended for a joke, Thomas," was the only reply.

But the family took it very seriously. In the mail at his office the next morning Mr. Selwyn found the following letters:—

- I.
- My dear Husband,—I shall not want a box at the opera this winter.
- Your grateful wife,
MARGARET SELWYN.
- II.
- Dear Papa,—I shall not want the opera cloak I spoke of the other day, as mamma will not want the opera box.
- Your affectionate daughter,
HELEN.
- III.
- Dear Father,—Last year I told you that I didn't want a college education, as I thought you couldn't afford it.
- Your converted son,
ALBERT R. SELWYN.
- IV.
- Dear, kind Papa,—This is the list of things I don't want:—
- A grand piano.
- A picture of Meissonier's.
- A coupé.
- A new dress from Worth's.
- A sealskin sacque, trimmed with chin-chilla.
- A season ticket to the Philharmonics.
- Anything else you might give me I am sure I should want. So, to be consistent, you must make it one of these.
- With love,
SALLY.
- V.
- Dear Papa Santa Claus,—I used to tell you beforehand what I wanted for Christmas; but mamma says that isn't the way they do now. The only things I don't want are the things I've got already. So please don't send me:—

Not any more jack-knives (at present).

Nor any more sleds.

Nor any more skates.

Nor any more books.

Most anything else will do. What I should like best would be a new bi— But mamma says that would be telling.

Very truly your friend,
ROBBIE MONTGOMERY SELWYN.

VI.

Dearest Papa,—I don't care for a new doll this Christmas; but Nellie Hartwell wants one dreadfully. So, if you should give me one, I could let Nellie play with it sometimes.

Your little girl,
MINNIE.

Mr. Selwyn groaned; but I have always heard that he met his obligations manfully.

Spirit of the Press.

The Inquirer, in referring to the death of Mr. Richard Bartram, says:—

It is chiefly to his initiative and sagacity that the excellent series of "Tracts for the Times," "Theological Essays," and other publications are due that have been issued in late years; and the wide-spread appreciation of many of these show that his efforts were wisely directed. He was a prime mover in the establishment of the "Essex Hall Pulpit," and was especially anxious that by its means the devotional side of our movement might be nourished. We know the scanty demand for that series was a trouble to him, but it must not be forgotten that this journal supplies a pretty copious store of this kind of literature. Mr. Bartram's acquaintance with the writings of many of our American brethren enabled him to give special help in selecting essays and other material for republication on this side of the Atlantic.

Charities and Reforms.

The forty-sixth annual report of the Children's Mission to the Children of the Destitute maintains the hopeful, earnest tone of previous reports. 232 children have been under care during the year, of whom 207 have been sent to places and returned to parents or friends, leaving 25 now in the home. The report includes the speeches of Rev. Albert Walkley, Rev. Albert Lazenby, Rev. E. I. Galvin, and Rev. Samuel M. Crothers at the annual meeting.

The forty-eighth annual report of the Massachusetts School for the Feeble-minded at Waltham shows that there are now 423 inmates of the school. The usual annual increase in numbers and the general development of the institution was checked last year by the general financial depression, but within the old numbers the results have been as gratifying as in any previous year. The trustees urge the necessity of stricter classification and the need of a new building for women.

Scott's Emulsion

is Cod-liver Oil without the fish-fat taste. You get all the virtue of the oil. You skip nothing but the taste.

XVIIIth CENTURY.

Furniture of antique design is now all the rage.

If such furniture is old, however, the pleasure of its possession is seriously handicapped. Dirt, stains, a dull varnish, weakened joints and braces, jerky drawers, and unsteady legs are not payment enough for the pleasure of association with the past. It is more satisfactory to have these beautiful shapes reproduced, and add convenience to your other enjoyments.

We are offering this season some exact copies of famous old pieces of furniture of the last century. We reproduce the exact tone of the mahogany. The metal mounts and trappings are accurately transcribed.

Here is the home desk of a professional man of three generations ago. It is useless to deny that it is more convenient than any of the modern desks which we plan with so much care.

And it is immensely decorative in the room. It is like a distinguished personage from another century.

Paine Furniture Co.,

48 CANAL STREET.

Important Works. "Unity Pulpit"

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-
DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CRO-WELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites

many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods

in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus,

love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR DECEMBER.

"The Wilderness shall be Glad." Rev. Francis B. Horn-brooke.

The Theology of Unitarians. Dr. Charles Carroll Everett.

Concord. H. Hayes Robbins.

Christmas Day. William Brunton.

Merit Recovery. Rev. Eli Fay, D.D.

Daily Sacrifice. Rev. Stopford W. Brooke.

The Open Vision. Rev. George H. Hosmer.

Like and Unlike.

The Outlook for Christian Union. W. H. Ramsay.

Installing a Minister. N. M. Brigham.

The National Conference. M. J. Savage.

Unity and Diversity. J. S. Lee.

Always Growing.

One Upward Look Each Day.

Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;

Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Alice P. Jackson;

Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Eliot; Literary Notes—Some Books.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

. Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents.

- NOW READY:
1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
 2. God in the City.
 3. Reaping Time.
 4. Called to be Saints.
 5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)
 6. The Religious Situation.
 7. The Forward Movement of Unitarianism. (By Rev. George Batchelor.)
 8. Our Divine Partnership.
 9. Dr. Gordon's Book, "The Christ of To-day."
 10. Thanks that I can be Thankful.
 11. The Morning Song of the Creation. (By Rev. Robert Collyer.)
 12. Some Lessons from the Life of O. B. Frothingham.
 13. Giving.
 14. God's Incarnation in the World and in the Human Race.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrance. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment, Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The recent death of Octavius Brooks Frothingham recalls to me some incidents in connection with his preaching in New York City, which possibly may not be without interest to the readers of the Christian Register.

I notice in one article on him a statement to the effect that he probably felt discouraged and disappointed over the apparent results of his work in New York; and, though it is too late for him to know it, I wish to give some publicity to what I happen to know of his influence upon myself while I was attending Columbia College Law School in that city. I had thought myself beyond the Orthodoxy in which I was reared, and used frequently to go to the Masonic Temple to be charmed by the oratory and the air of complete religious freedom of Mr. Frothingham. He was, I think, the first liberal religious preacher I had ever heard; and it was invigorating to me to find so many of my own solitary musings indorsed, confirmed, and amplified by a religious thinker of his power. As I listened to his eloquence, I used to think that what he was doing, standing Sunday by Sunday and liberating the minds of men from depressing superstition, was the charming thing in the world which I could wish I had the power to do. But I recognized that to do it, to stand "Independent," as the signboard displayed each Sunday morning on the corner of Sixth Avenue and Twenty-third Street read, required a force and power and oratory beyond me, and possibly beyond even him, had he not been able to make first a reputation in connection with some organized church body,—a thing which I then felt I could not conscientiously do.

I never made the acquaintance of Mr. Frothingham, deterred therefrom by my diffidence, re-enforced by stories of his coldness and want of personal interest in others,—stories which the orthodox, fearful of his influence, did not spare to spread. I have always since regretted that I did not risk the possible repulse; and, had I done so, I might have been saved some years of doubt and unrest perhaps.

What I write this for, however, is to pay my little tribute to his influence for good, and to suggest the reflection that there may have been other silent young men in those Masonic Temple audiences, and men and women not so young, whose currents of life may have been altered, and whose subsequent lives may even now be spreading the influence there given, even if no credit is known to belong to that fearless preacher of righteousness to that "Independent" congregation in Masonic Temple.

I remember that on one occasion, after returning from hearing Mr. Frothingham preach, I was asked what he had talked about; and, starting in to give an idea of the discourse, I surprised myself by going through all the outlines of it from start to finish in the order given,—a thing I had never been able to do of any other preacher I had ever listened to. Rarely ever was he tempted into any branches of his subject, however alluring; and, when he did so leave the main thought, he apologized for the digression, and soon returned. In general, he kept to the main trunk, from very roots to topmost twig of it; and I have often run ahead of his words in my mind, and anticipated the points to which he had not yet come in his discourse, but to which he did come in due time.

One more reminiscence will show his singular convincing power. A young man from the same Western city as myself was in attendance upon the Union Theological Seminary in New York. I had been with him on two or three Sundays to hear various orthodox preachers of note; and one Sunday I said to him, "Now I have been to hear your favorite preachers, come with me once to hear mine." Put upon this ground, he could not well refuse, though he did demur some; and I took him to the Masonic Temple. On that particular day Mr. Frothingham went into an analysis of the orthodox Christian as found in our society. He pictured him with all his merits and all his limitations,—the average unthinking believer, the man of business and affairs, of few books, including the Bible and excluding Darwin,—all without malice, perfectly fair, but cutting in its implications. My friend sat leaning forward in his seat, his eyes riveted upon the speaker from opening sentence to closing word.

The service closed: we passed out and down Sixth Avenue. I resolved not to be the first to break silence. We walked nearly a block with no word between us. Then my friend broke out impetuously, "Well, H., if the Lord will forgive me for going to hear that man to-day, I'll never go to hear him again as long as I live!"

H. T. R.

REV. OBED ELDRIDGE.

By the death of this pastor of the Unitarian church of West Dedham, our ministry has lost one of its most consecrated and faithful members. Educated in the public schools of East Wareham, Mass., he began his active life as a mechanic. Although he had not the privilege of academic or divinity school training, he aspired to the work of the ministry; and, while supporting himself and a rapidly increasing family at his daily work, he devoted his spare time to the cultivation of his mind. He was possessed of rare moral and spiritual qualities; and these, together with his habit of mental industry, made him a good student and a good worker in the sphere of church activity. The world was his university, and he was a devoted student of all that ennoble human life. He became well read, and attained great facility in the use of strong, pure English. Gradually, in Fairhaven, Mass., and elsewhere, he became accustomed to taking part in church services.

His relatives say that from the age of five years he was always "preaching," and it was with great joy that he entered upon the work of the Christian ministry when in his forty-third year.

In 1881 he was ordained in Dighton, Mass. Later he had a term of service in Northboro. In connection with his pastorate at West Dedham he preached at the First Parish Church in Dover, Mass.

In all of these places he has left a strong influence for good. He loved to work for the young, and drew out their hearty respect, and led them to heights of character. He was deeply interested in social questions, being active in temperance work. A wish has been publicly expressed that the lecture which he recently gave at the Library Building in West Dedham might be printed for distribution. He was of a social disposition, and was a member of several fraternal bodies.

Kind-hearted and sincere in his friendship, he was much beloved by all who knew him. His work was by no means limited to the sphere of his own parish, but was freely given in behalf of all good causes.

In his own family is an object-lesson of what he tried to do for his young people in the various parishes to which he ministered. He leaves a widow, five sons, and a daughter,—a family in which the highest principles of Christian character have ruled with the noblest results.

There was a very large gathering at his funeral at the church in West Dedham. Representatives of all his parishes were present, as were prominent people from all denominations in town.

No better example than his is needed to prove how much a man may do to overcome the obstacles to the fulfilment of a noble ambition, and to enter upon such work as shall make him a true minister of God to men.

A. M.

Some harps have been discovered in Egyptian tombs. It is said that the strings in several instances were intact, and gave forth distinct sounds after a silence of three thousand years.

an appetizing, nourishing food for invalids, nursing mothers and delicate children. A valuable food, in compact form, stimulating and strengthening, for long bicycle rides, fishing and hunting trips, or when traveling.

SOMATOSE-BISCUIT,

containing 10% Somatose, are made only by The American Biscuit & Manufacturing Co., New York.

Somatose is a scientific food, consisting of the albumoses, the elements essential for proper nourishment. It is concentrated, palatable, easily digestible, and quickly assimilated, promoting a rapid gain in flesh and strength.

Somatose-Biscuit are obtainable from all druggists.

Send for descriptive pamphlets to the makers, or to Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents.

They're going both the women who wash, and the things that are washed, in the old-fashioned way. That constant rub, rub, rub, over the washboard down the business. Hard rubbing is hard work. Hard rubbing wears out the clothes; hard work wears out the women.

There's nothing of the kind, if you'll let Pearlina do the washing. All you'll have to do, then, is to look after it. It'll save all this work and rubbing that does so much harm. But, because Pearlina makes washing easy, you needn't be afraid that it isn't safe. That idea is worn out. Just as your clothes will be, unless you use Pearlina.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 385 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Mozoomdar's Topics of To-day.

Books.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. —New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Spiritual Life.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged.—Christian Register.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls; "A Mere Man"; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Templed of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Conversion of Energy; Two Meanings of Religion; The Undiscovered Country; Samuel Longfellow; The Old, Old Story; The Fulness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

- Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.
1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and person a characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
 2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
 3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GARRETT P. SERVISS.
 4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
 5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
 6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoology. By ROSSITER W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
 7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral line; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
 8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
 9. EVOLUTION OF SOCIETY: Primitive man; growth of the family, city, and State; development of the domestic relations; is society an organism? By JAMES A. SKILLTON, Esq.
 10. EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY: Origin of religious beliefs; ancestor-worship; nature-worship; the Absolute. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
 11. EVOLUTION OF MORALS: How altruism grows out of egoism; the proper balance. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
 12. PROOFS OF EVOLUTION: From geology, morphology, embryology, metamorphosis, rudimentary organs, geographical distribution, etc. By NELSON C. PARSHALL.
 13. EVOLUTION AS RELATED TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: The Unknowable; design; miracle. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
 14. THE PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION: Relation of the doctrine to prevailing philosophical systems. By STARR HOYT NICHOLS.
 15. THE EFFECTS OF EVOLUTION ON THE COMING CIVILIZATION: Plans for social regeneration as tested by evolution. By REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.
 16. THE SCOPE AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EVOLUTION PHILOSOPHY: Agnosticism, materialism, idealism, practical problems. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
 17. THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF HERBERT SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY: The relation of religion to morality. By SYLVAN DREY.
 18. THE RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE: The nature of sense-perception; sight, sound, taste, smell, feeling; the doctrine of the Unknowable. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
 19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

- Now ready:—
1. The Public Service of Religion.
 2. The Beseeching God.
 3. Christian Unity.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANU JOHN H. PRAY, SONS & Co., FACTURERS' CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY, PRICES. 658 WASHINGTON ST. OFF. BOYLSTON ST. BOSTON.

Pleasanties.

Seward: "Were you aware that Noah understood all about electricity?" Baldwin: "No, did he?" "Most assuredly; he made the arc light an Ananias."

Miss Gorton: "I was told to what the poet alluded when he spoke of the embers of a dying year?" Bob: "November and December, I suppose."

Customer: "Have you 'Prometheus Bound?'" Clerk (in bookstore): "I never heard of Prometheus, sir; but all our books are bound."—Philadelphia Record.

An English paper contained the following advertisement: "Lost, a cameo brooch, representing Venus and Adonis on the Deucalion sea. Reward about ten o'clock on Wednesday evening."—Exchange.

Sammy: "Who is the father of his country?" Jimmie: "George Washington." Sammy: "Correct. Who is his uncle?" Jimmie: "Why, I don't know." Sammy: "Uncle Sam."—Harper's Round Table.

Daniel O'Connell, the Irish orator, was applied to by a stranger for his autograph before the collecting mania was so fully developed as now. He replied by letter: "Sir, I never send autographs. Yours, Daniel O'Connell."—Exchange.

Very Polite.—Miss Constance: "I'm so glad you think I have improved in playing that nocturne; I hope to be perfect in it next time we meet." Mr. Smith (gallantly): "O Miss Constance, I'm sure I hope we shall meet before that."—Exchange.

"Laura writes from home that she has bought a wheel," said Mrs. Figg to the aunt with whom she is spending the summer. "I am glad to hear that the old fashion is coming in again," said the old lady. "I allow I'll have to come up and teach her how to spin."—Cincinnati Tribune.

A little girl who is accustomed to the plainest style of living was taken by her mother to dine with a rich friend lately. On her returning to her humble home, she called out to her sister, in an ecstasy of triumph and delight, "O Polly, we had four dinners, all one after another!"—American.

"Seems to me," remarked Wilbur, as he thought about certain things, "that, if they have an insect called a bee and a bird called a jay, there ought to be things named after the other letters in the alphabet. For instance, a Q would make a splendid animal, because it has a tail to start with."—Harper's Young People.

An old woman walked into a bank in Inverness, threw down her deposit-book, and said she wished to draw all her money. Having got it, she retired to a corner of the room and counted it. She then marched up to the teller, and exclaimed: "Ay, that'll do, ma man; jist pit it back again. I only wanted to see if it was a' richt."—Dundee News.

Brown (expert shorthand reporter): "I say, James, the boy from the newspaper office has called for the report of that lecture. Is it finished?" James (a novice): "All but a short sentence in the middle of it, and I can't for the life of me make out from my notes what it is." Brown: "Oh, just put in 'Great applause,' and let it go." James acts on the suggestion, and the lecture is sent for publication with the doctored part reading: "'Friends, I will detain you but a few moments longer.' [Great applause.]"—American.

The following story of bucolic ignorance is told in Mr. Perry Fitzgerald's newly published biography of Sir Henry Irving (Chatto & Windus). Once, when visiting Stratford-on-Avon with Toole, Mr. Irving saw a rustic sitting on a fence, whom they submitted to an interrogatory. "That's Shakspeare's house, isn't it?" it was asked innocently. "Ees." "Ever been there?" "Noa." "How long has he been dead?" "Dunno." "What did he do?" "Dunno." "Did he write?" "Oh, yes, he did, summat." "What was it?" "Well, I thing he writ Boible."—New York Observer.

HIS RETORT COURTEOUS.

Dr. Chalmers, the eminent divine, was fond of telling the following story:—

"Lady Betty Cunningham, having had some difference of opinion with the parish minister, instead of putting her usual contribution in the collecting-plate, merely gave a stately bow. This having occurred several Sundays in succession, the elder in charge of the plate at last lost patience, and blurted out, 'We cud dae wi' less o' yer manners, and mair o' yer siller, ma leddy.'"

Dining on one occasion at the house of a nobleman, he happened to repeat the anecdote, whereupon the host, in a not over-well pleased tone, said:—

"Are you aware, Dr. Chalmers, that Lady Betty is a relative of mine?"

"I was not aware, my lord," replied the doctor; "but, with your permission, I shall mention the fact the next time I tell the story."—The Standard.

TOLENE; you should therefore be careful to get the genuine.

Sold everywhere in tins, with trade-marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin. Made only by

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY. CHICAGO, 224 State Street, BOSTON, PORTLAND, ME.

Is the making of a pie. The making of a crisp crust depends largely upon the shortening. Use COTTOLENE, the new vegetable shortening, instead of lard, and soggy results will be an unknown element in your pastry. Cottolene should always be economically used—two-thirds as much Cottolene as you would ordinarily use of lard or butter, being ample to produce the most desirable results. The saving in a year represents a considerable item.

There are many imitations of COTTOLENE; you should therefore be careful to get the genuine.

Sold everywhere in tins, with trade-marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin. Made only by

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY. CHICAGO, 224 State Street, BOSTON, PORTLAND, ME.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

All forms of Life and Endowment policies issued. ANNUAL CASH distributions are paid upon all policies.

Every policy has indorsed thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.

Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec.

Stylish Designs in

Ladies' Watches to suit any gown. Black oxidized steel watches, plain or repousse, very much in favor now for general wear or HALF MOURNING.

Also bright and charming shades in enamel for evening dresses.

Our unquestioned guarantee with every watch.

The Waterbury Watch Co.

Waterbury, Conn. Send for Catalogue No. 150

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

TRADE MARK REGISTERED.
DIABETES FLOUR
Also Gluten Dyspepsia Flour, Barley Crystals, and Patent Biscuit Cake and Pastry Flour.
Unrivalled in America or Europe.
Pamphlets and Baking Samples Free.
Write Farwell & Rhines, Watertown, N. Y., U. S. A.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES
of Copper and Tin
BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

Its SCREW and PLUNGE LIFT for regulating Wick; Lift Attachment for LIGHTING without removing Chimney; SIMPLICITY of Design for Rewicking, and Cleanliness combine to make the

MILLER Lamp

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

All parts Interchangeable, any of them can be supplied, and it costs no more than the ordinary centre-draft Lamp without our Patented Improvements.

EDWARD MILLER & CO.,

Mill and Factories, Meriden, Conn.

63 Pearl Street, Boston.

EBBITT HOUSE,

WASHINGTON, D. C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Popular Prices. Regular rate $4.00 per day up. Fifty rooms on the sixth floor, with steam heat and electric light, reduced to $2.50 and 3.00 per day. Fifty rooms on other floors reduced from $4.00 to $3.50 per day. Parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates. Special rates for the Army and Navy Officers and the Clergy.

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building.

BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address

HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address

JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.

REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

POWDER POINT SCHOOL

FOR BOYS.

Elementary and advanced classes. Individual teaching. Scholarships.

F. B. KNAPP, S.B., Duxbury, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,

AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

No. 865.
Wrought
Iron
Banquet.

Illustrated
Catalogue
Sent Free.

GEO. H. ELLIS,

Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job
Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

Miss Emily C. Hart Jan 96
DURKEE'S SPICES
THE WELL KNOWN "GAUNTLET BRAND"
EXCEL IN PURITY, STRENGTH & FLAVOR.

3 2400 00269 8862

EARL MORSE WILBUR LIBRARY
STARR KING SCHOOL FOR THE MINISTRY
2441 LE CONTE AVENUE
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA 94709

